Ellie looked up. The tour group was moving ahead, further up the mountain. And Mom was on her case... again.

“Ok, Mom, I’m coming.”

Ellie looked up. The tour group was moving ahead, further up the mountain. And Mom was on her case... again.

“Ok, Mom, I’m coming.”

“How is it possible...” Mom began, “for you to be on your cell phone this entire trip?”

Ellie had rejoined the group now.

Dad was looking over the side of the cliff. “It’s a loong way down.” he said, then peered through binoculars at the distant snowcapped mountains.

The tour guide said, “And that mountain there, is the great Apu Wakachinchay. Very sacred to the Andean people...”

Eventually, they came to a rocky outcrop, where the tour guide lay some fabric on the ground. And just then...

She caught herself,

but the cell phone...

“Yeah Dad, I’m okay.”

Mom pulled her into a hug. “Oh my god, that could have been bad.”

The other tourists were shaken, too. But it’d been a minor tremor. Nothing bad had happened. Nothing bad, except...

“Ellie, what’s wrong?”

“...I lost my cell phone.”

II.

On the way back down the mountain, Ellie kept looking over the edge, at the trees and foliage below. “Don’t worry, we’ll get you a new phone when we get home,” Dad had said.

“But that’s days from now. And my team... they need me.”

“Not while you’re on vacation,” Mom said. “Plus, it’ll be better like this. You don’t come to Peru everyday.”

So... no cell phone. No connection. No vida.

As they continued watching the condors, as they kept moving down the mountain, Ellie didn’t mention it. Yet all she could think about were her friends, back in the States, and the summer she was spending without them.

GO!!!”

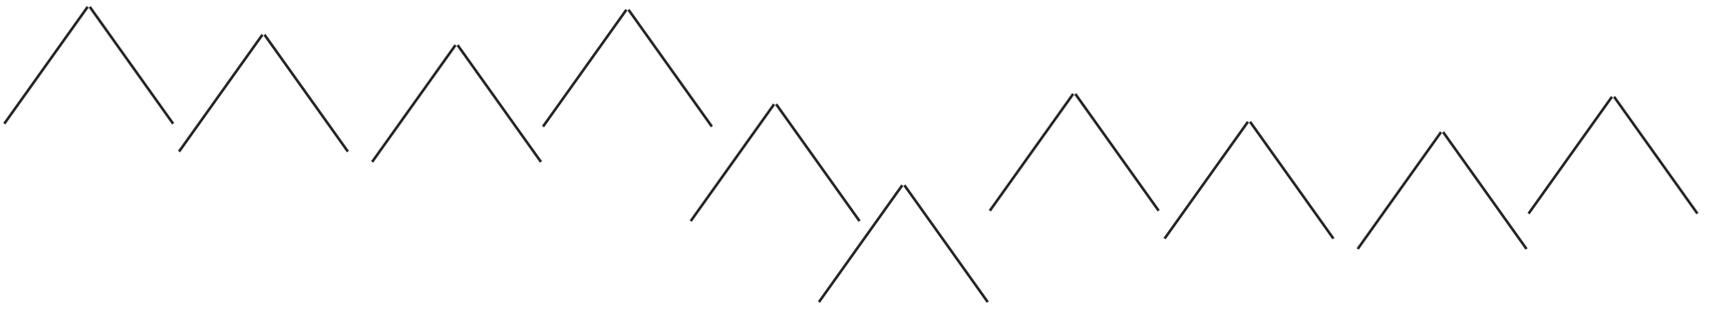

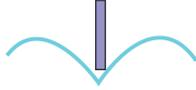

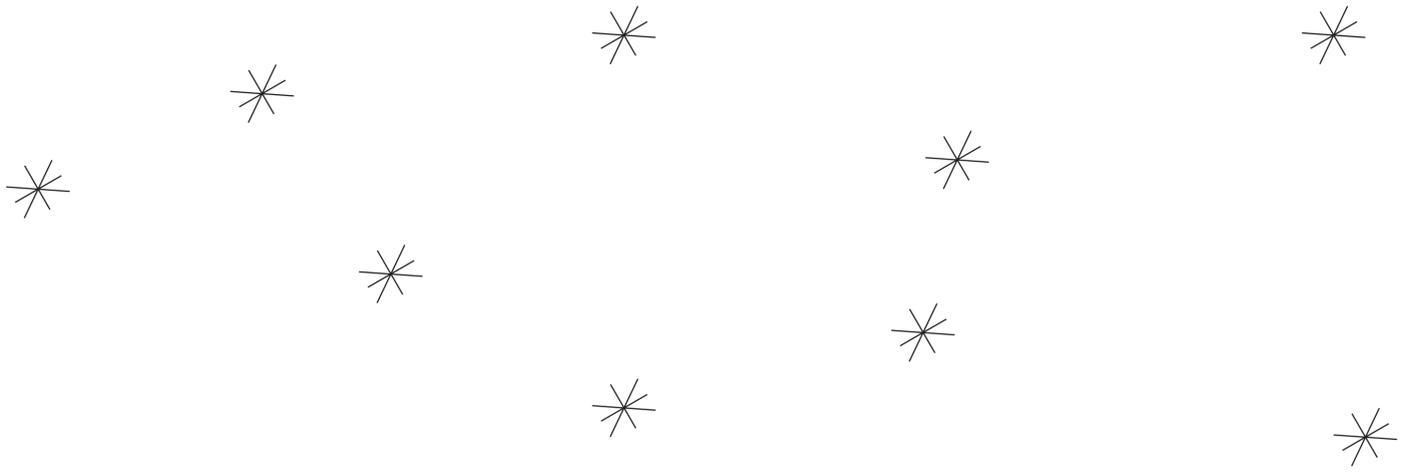

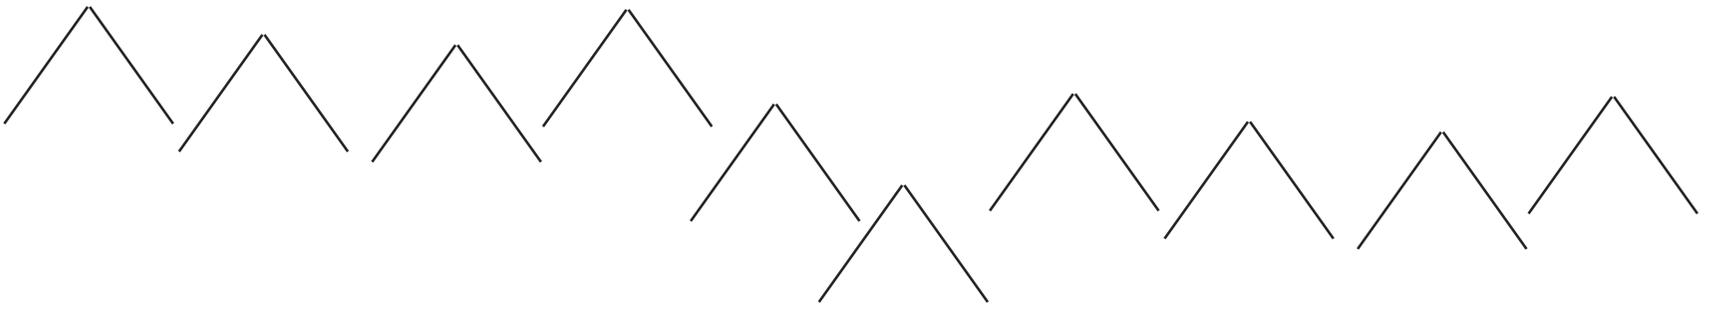

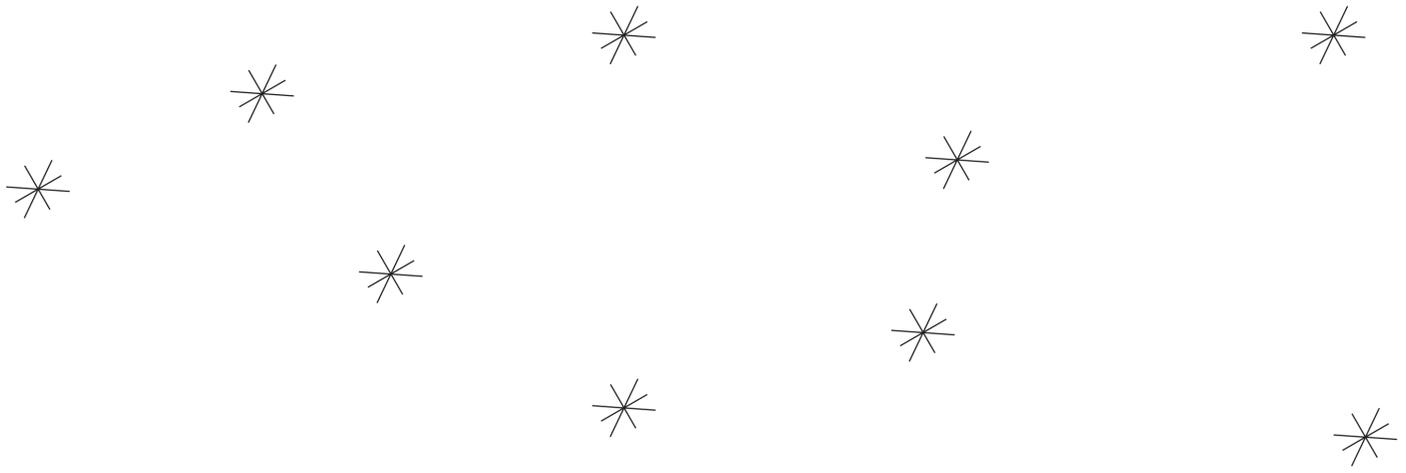

The drop in Ellie's gut, the wind rushing past her cheeks, then the sudden uptake as they were carried aloft into the air, out and away from the city towards the mountains... she'd never experienced anything like it.

The drop in Ellie’s gut, the wind rushing past her cheeks, then the sudden uptake as they were carried aloft into the air, out and away from the city towards the mountains... she’d never experienced anything like it.

“I suppose that’s reasonable...”

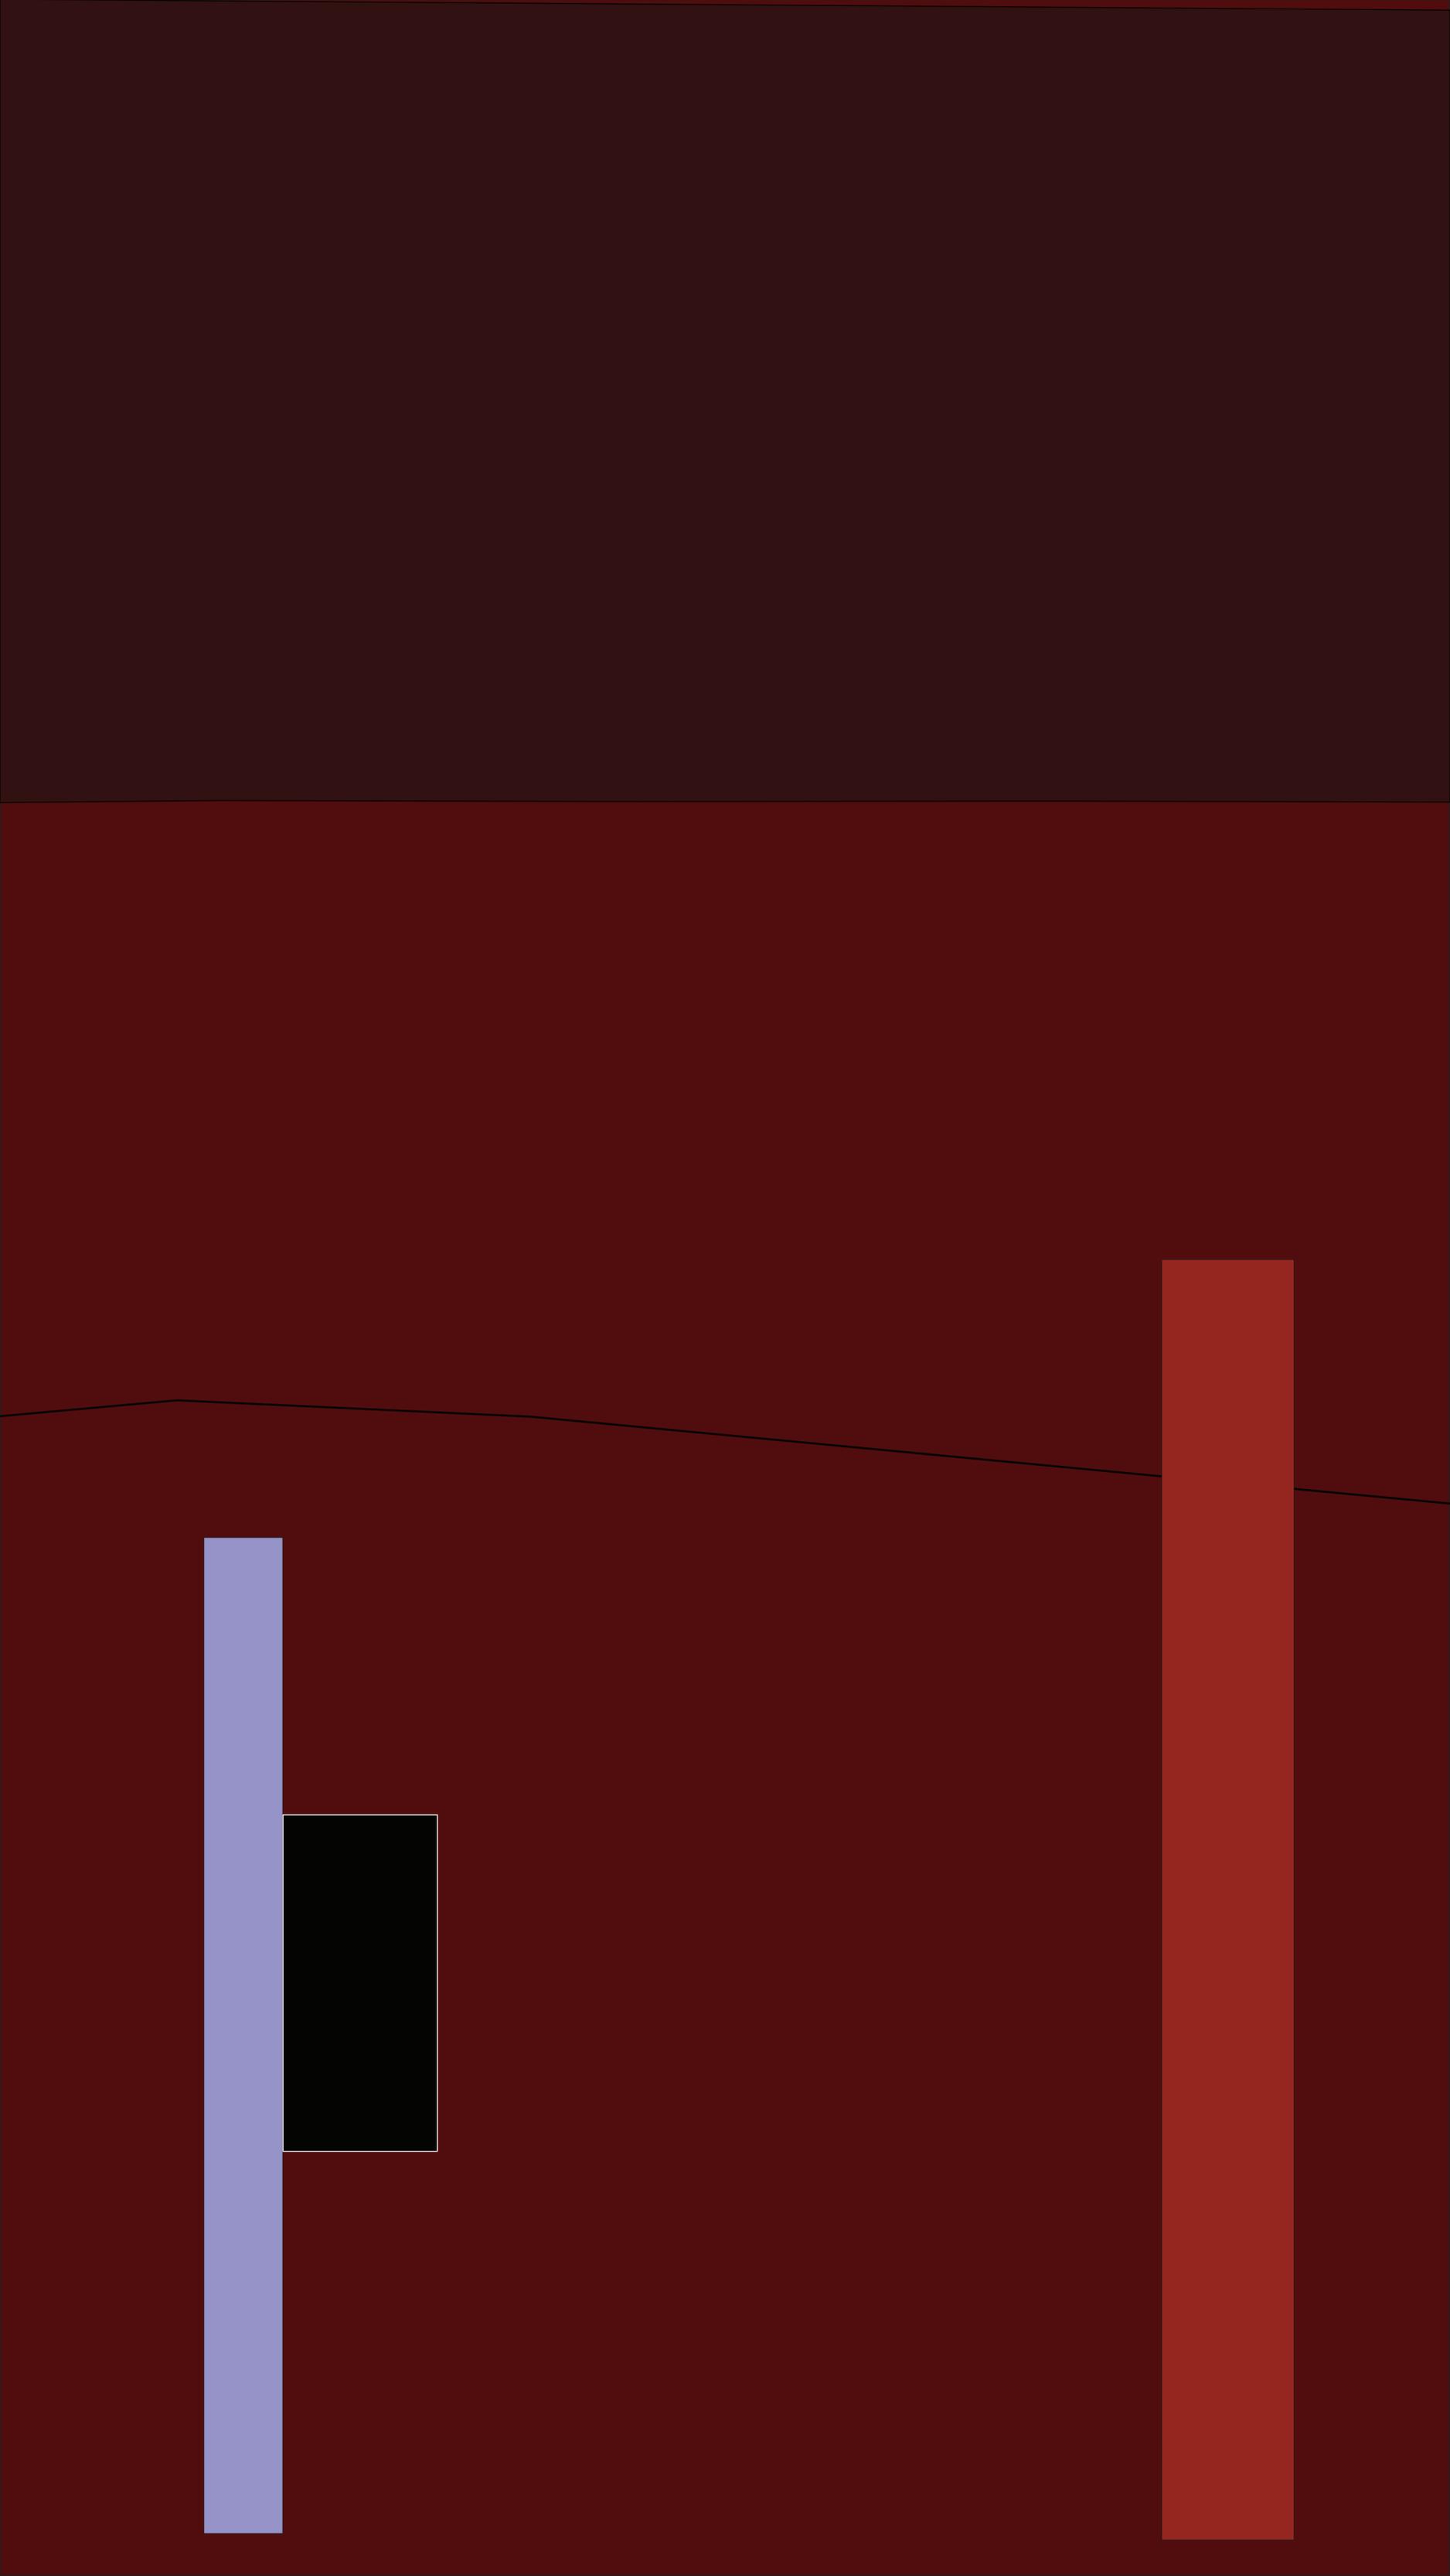

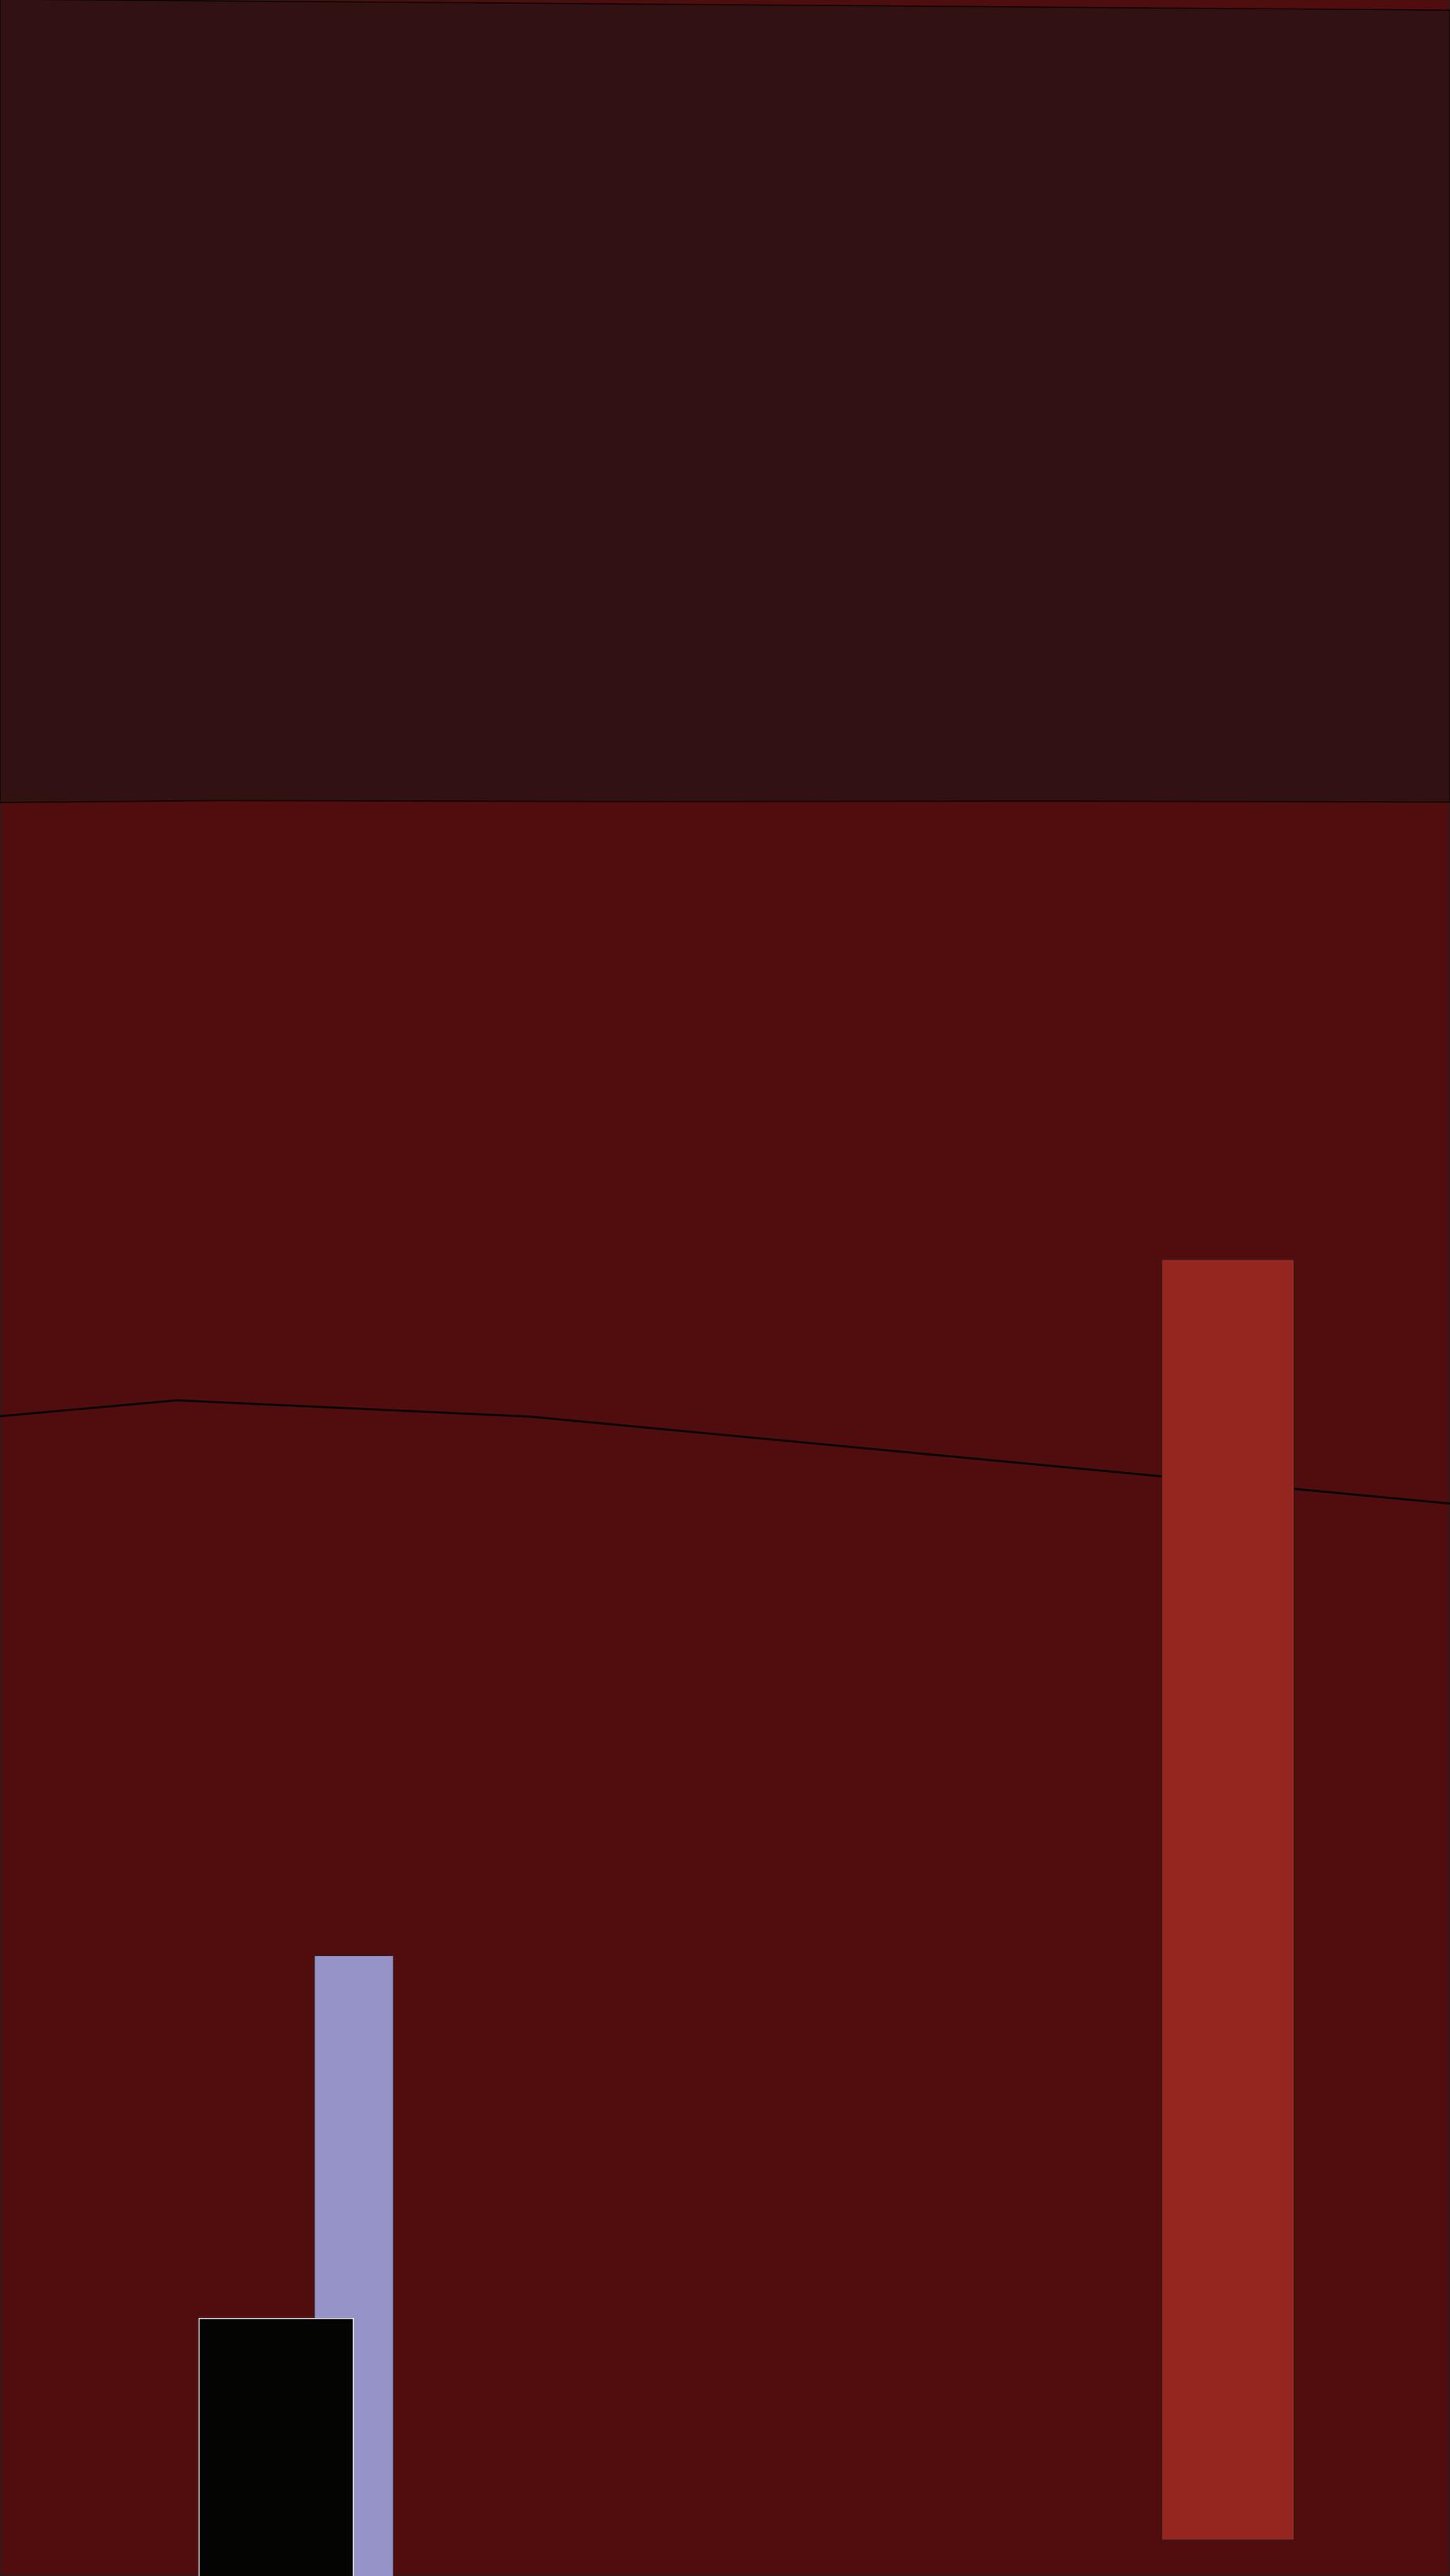

“I suppose that’s reasonable...”

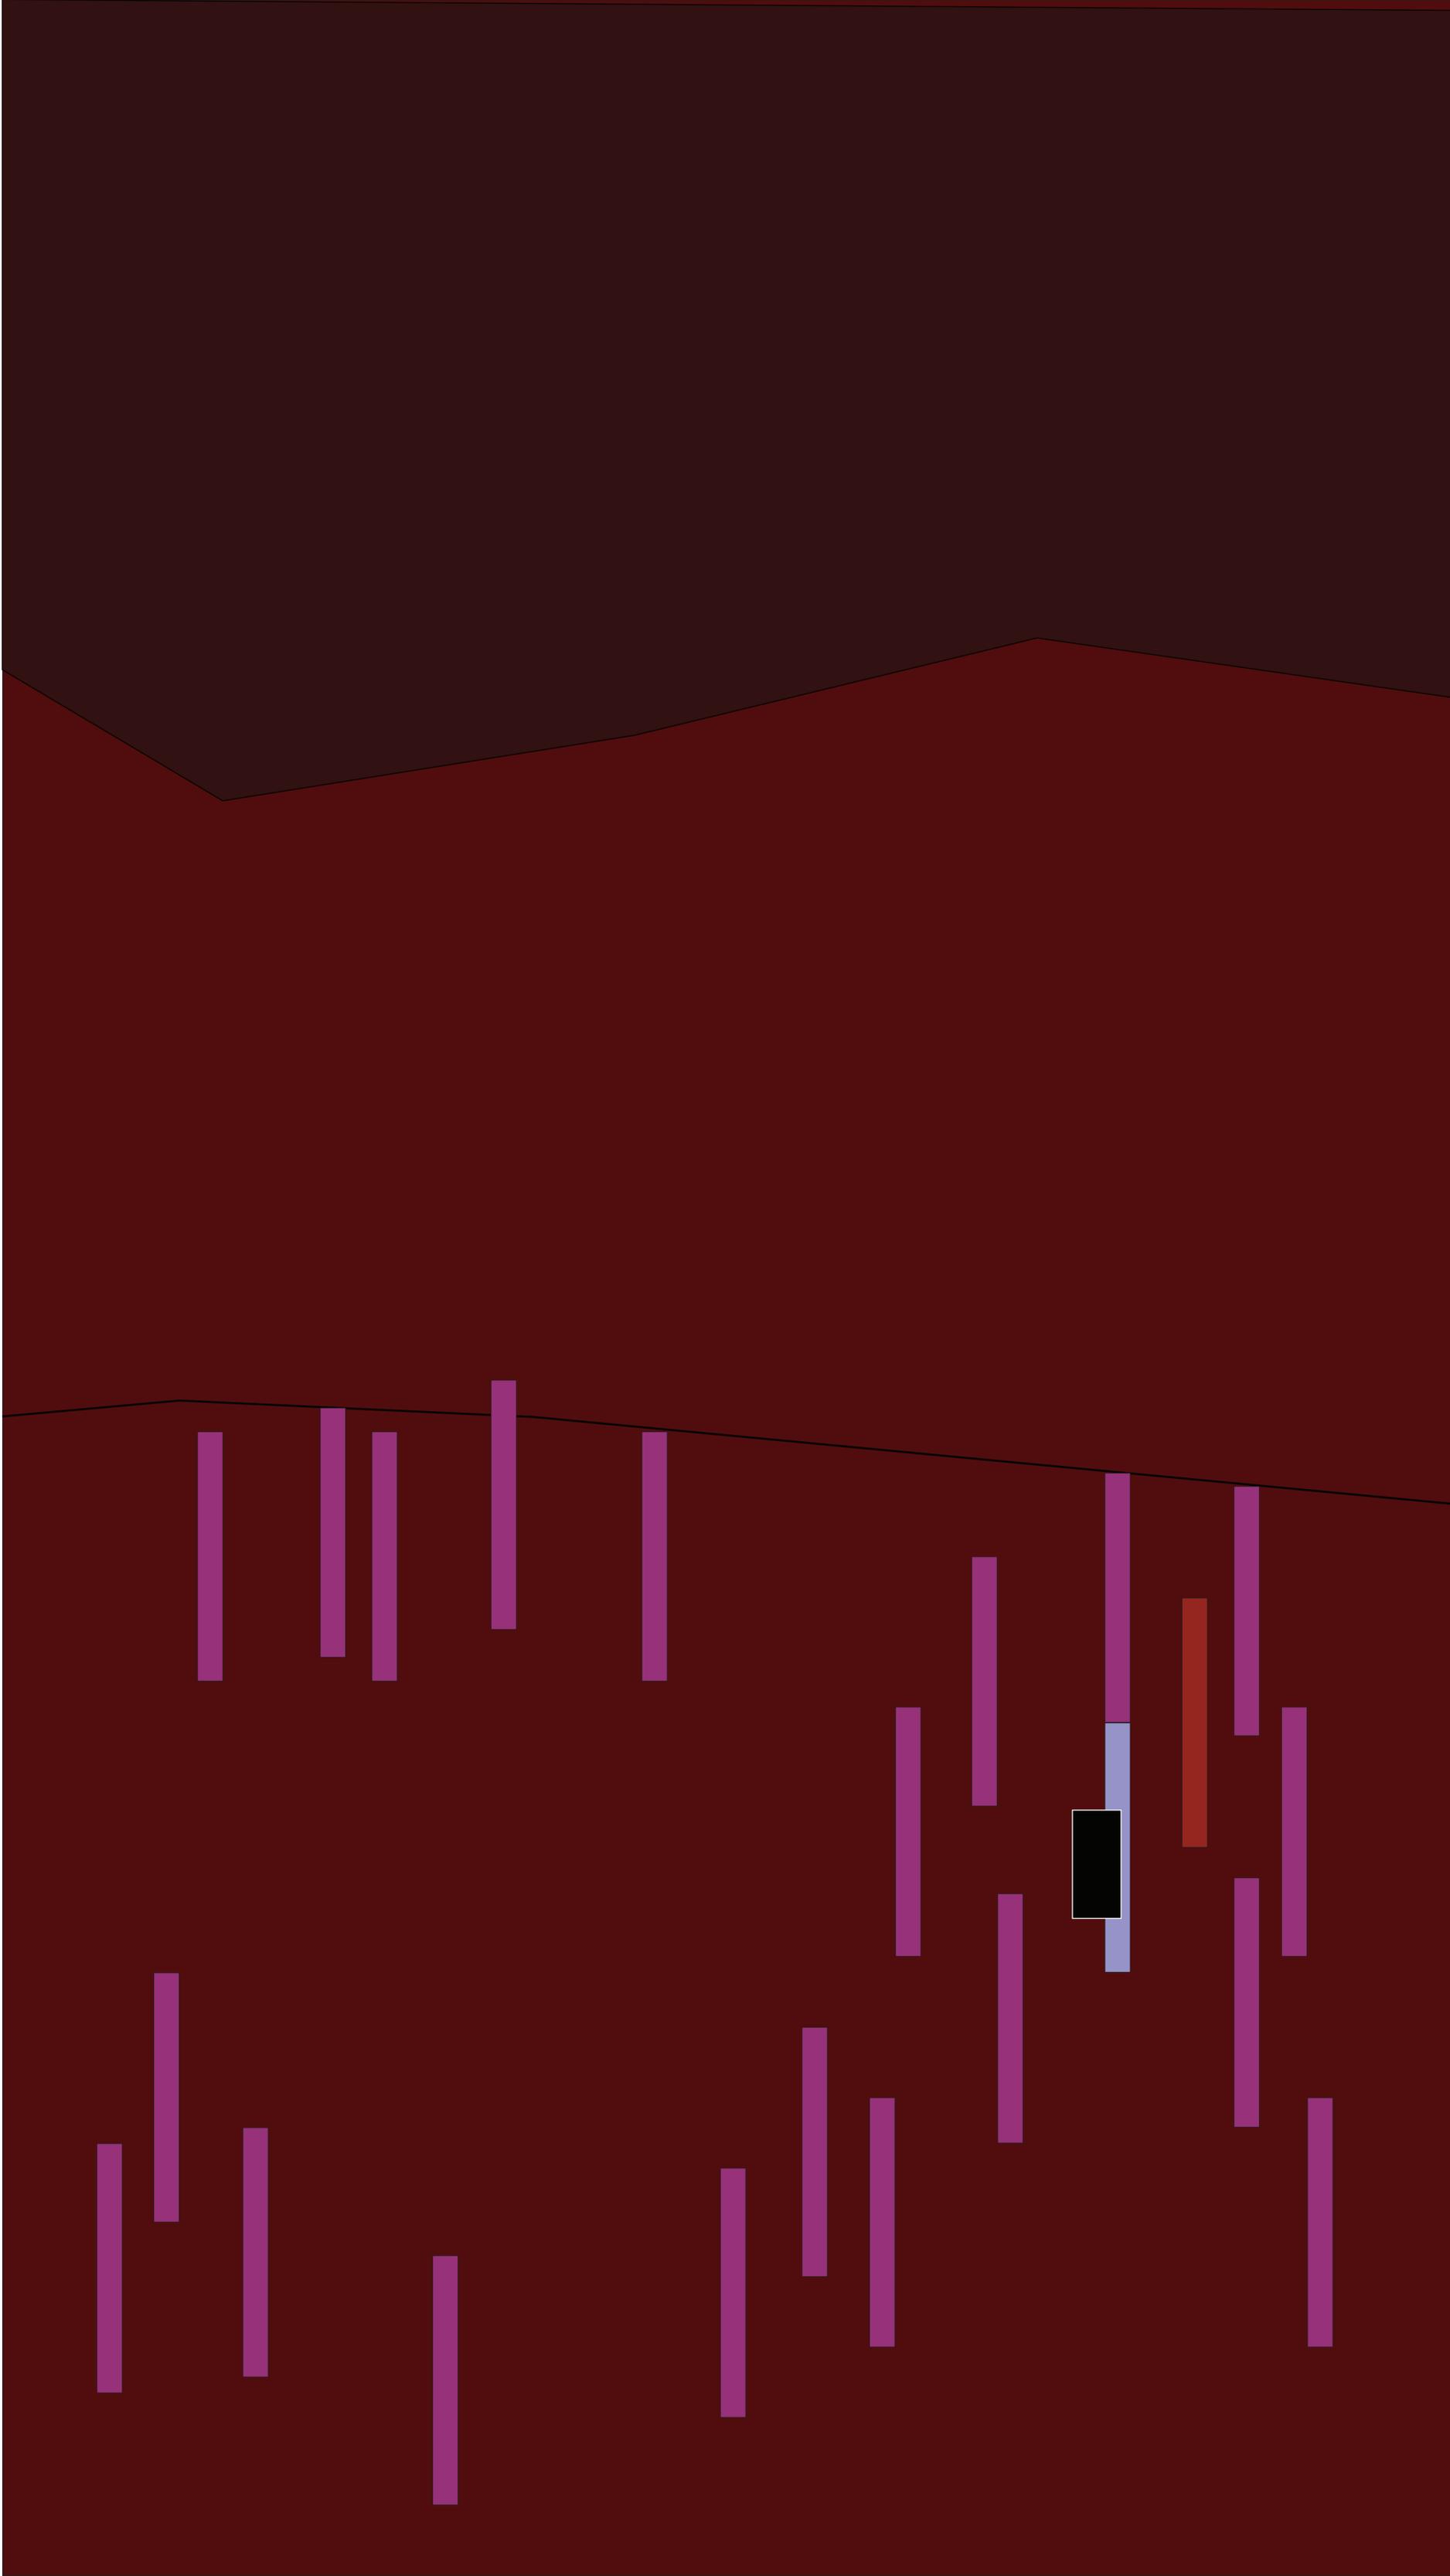

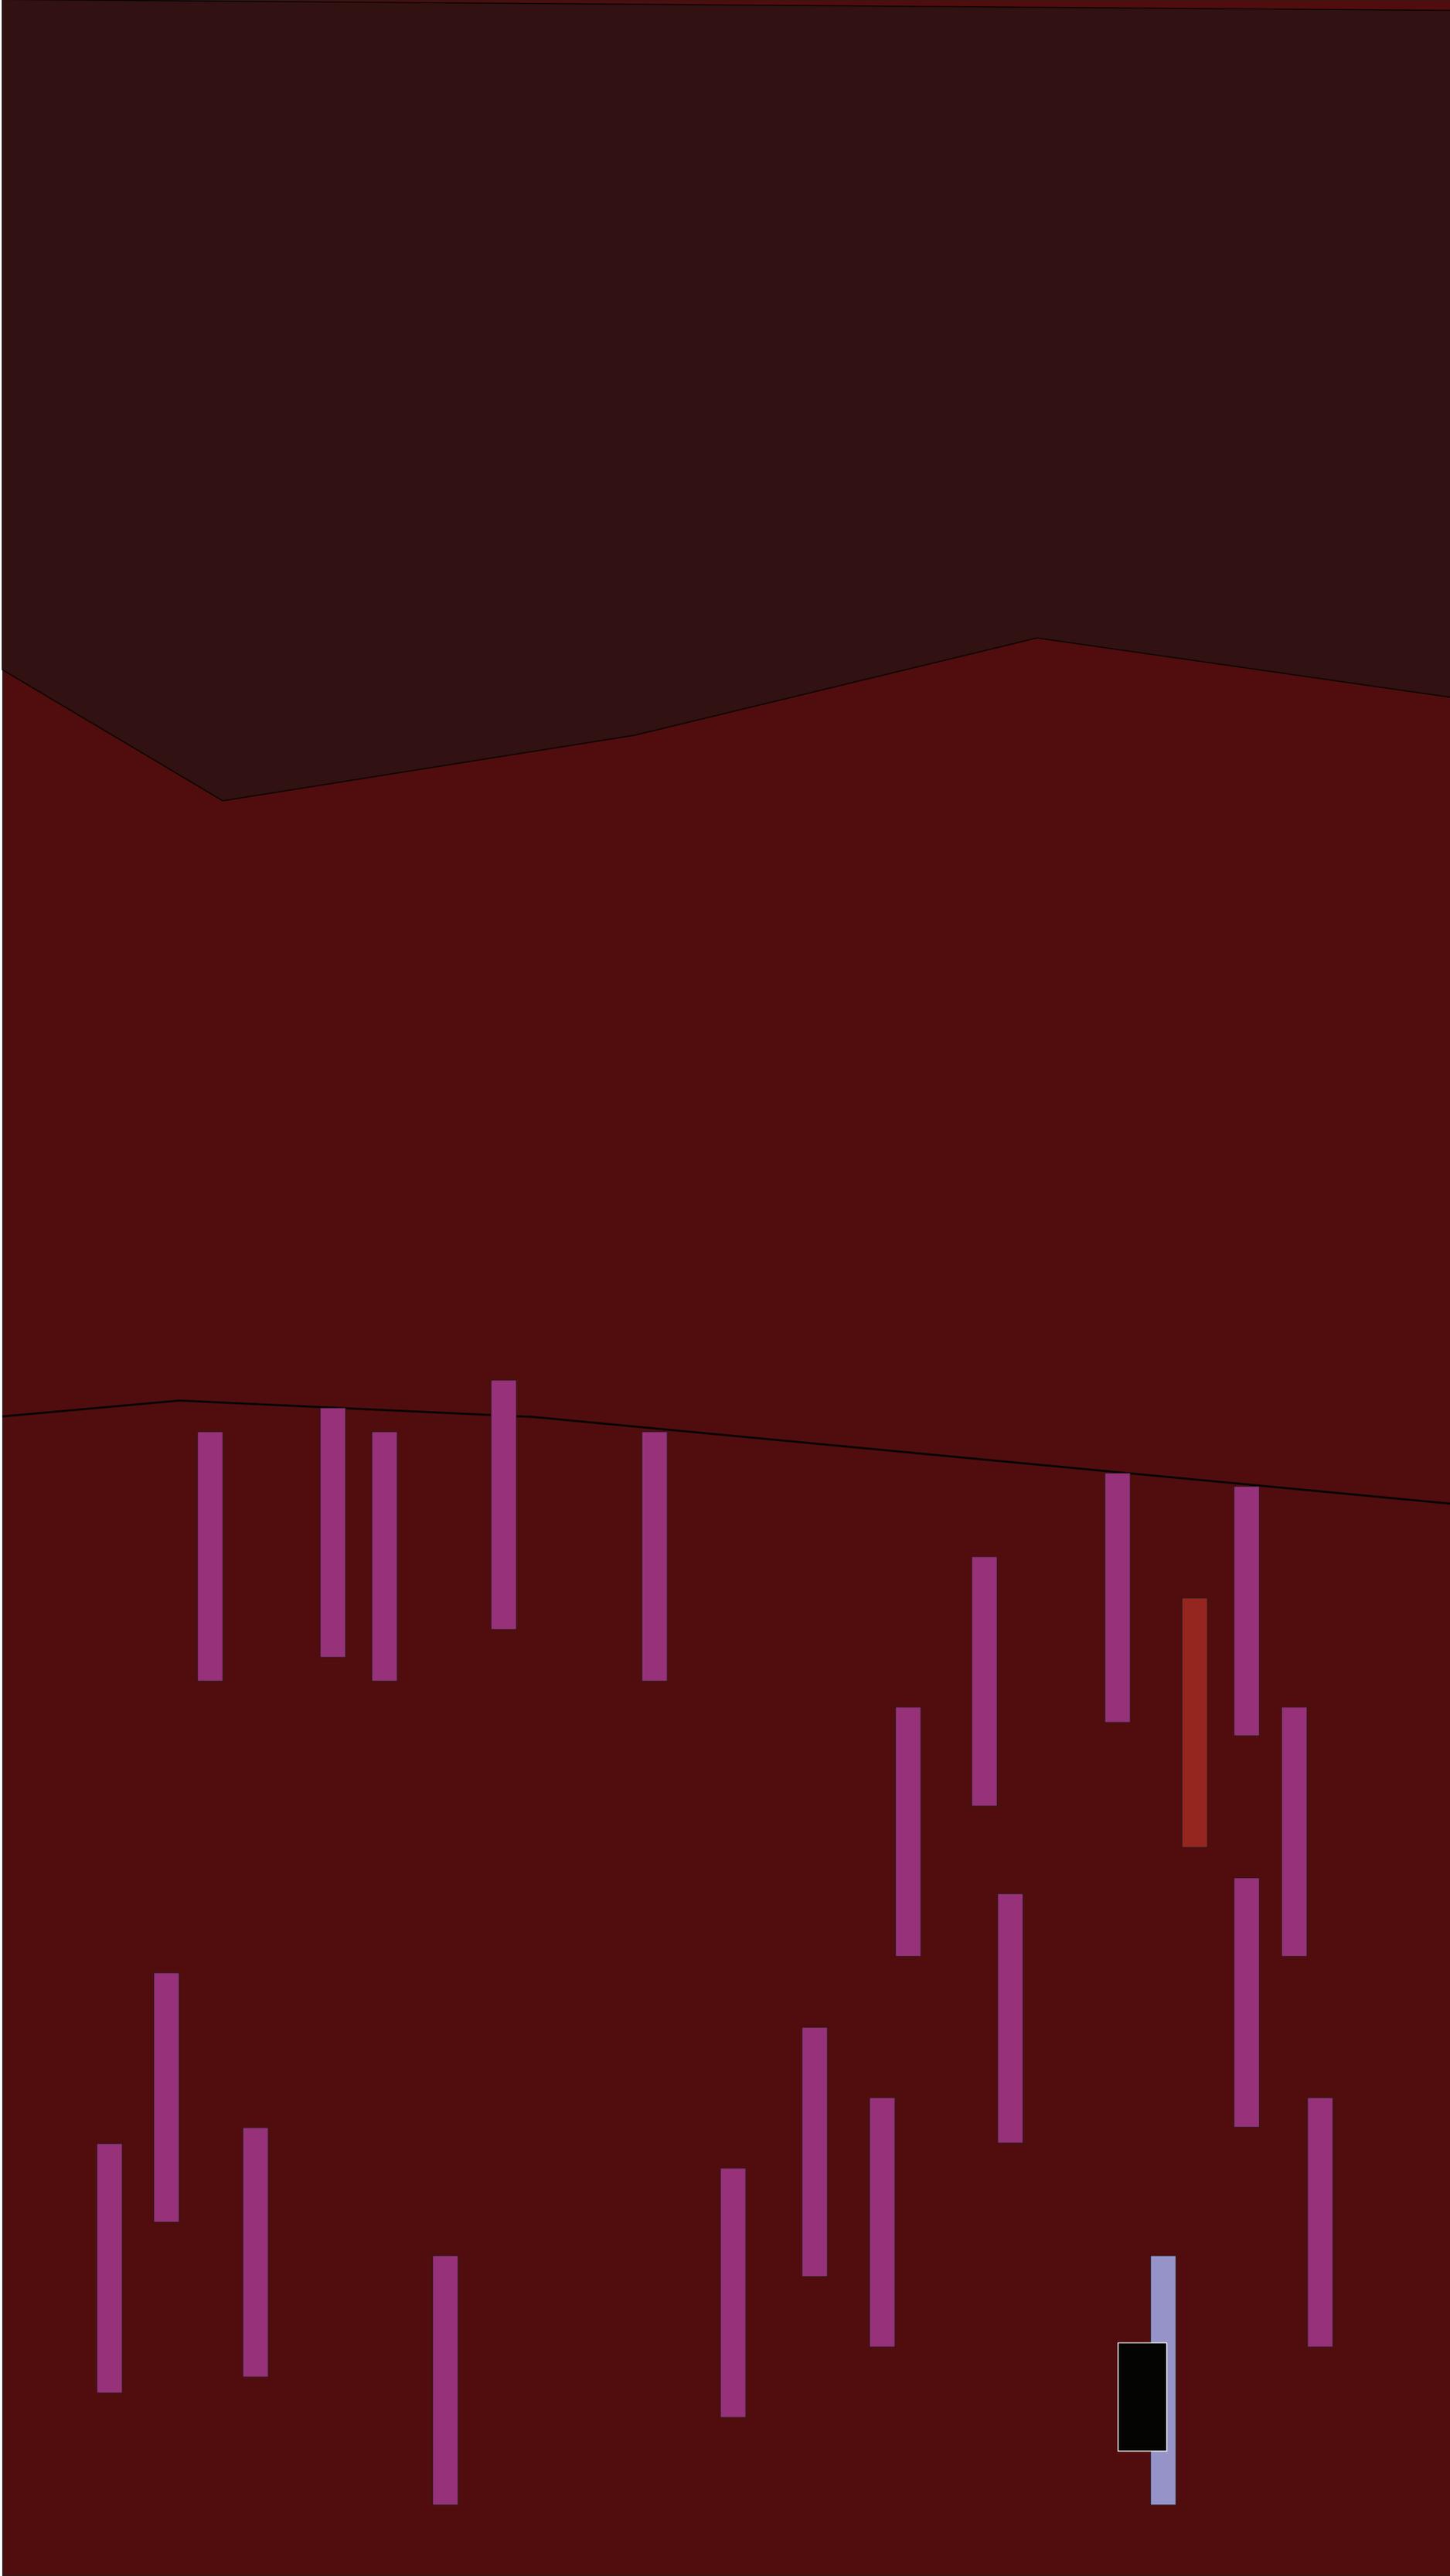

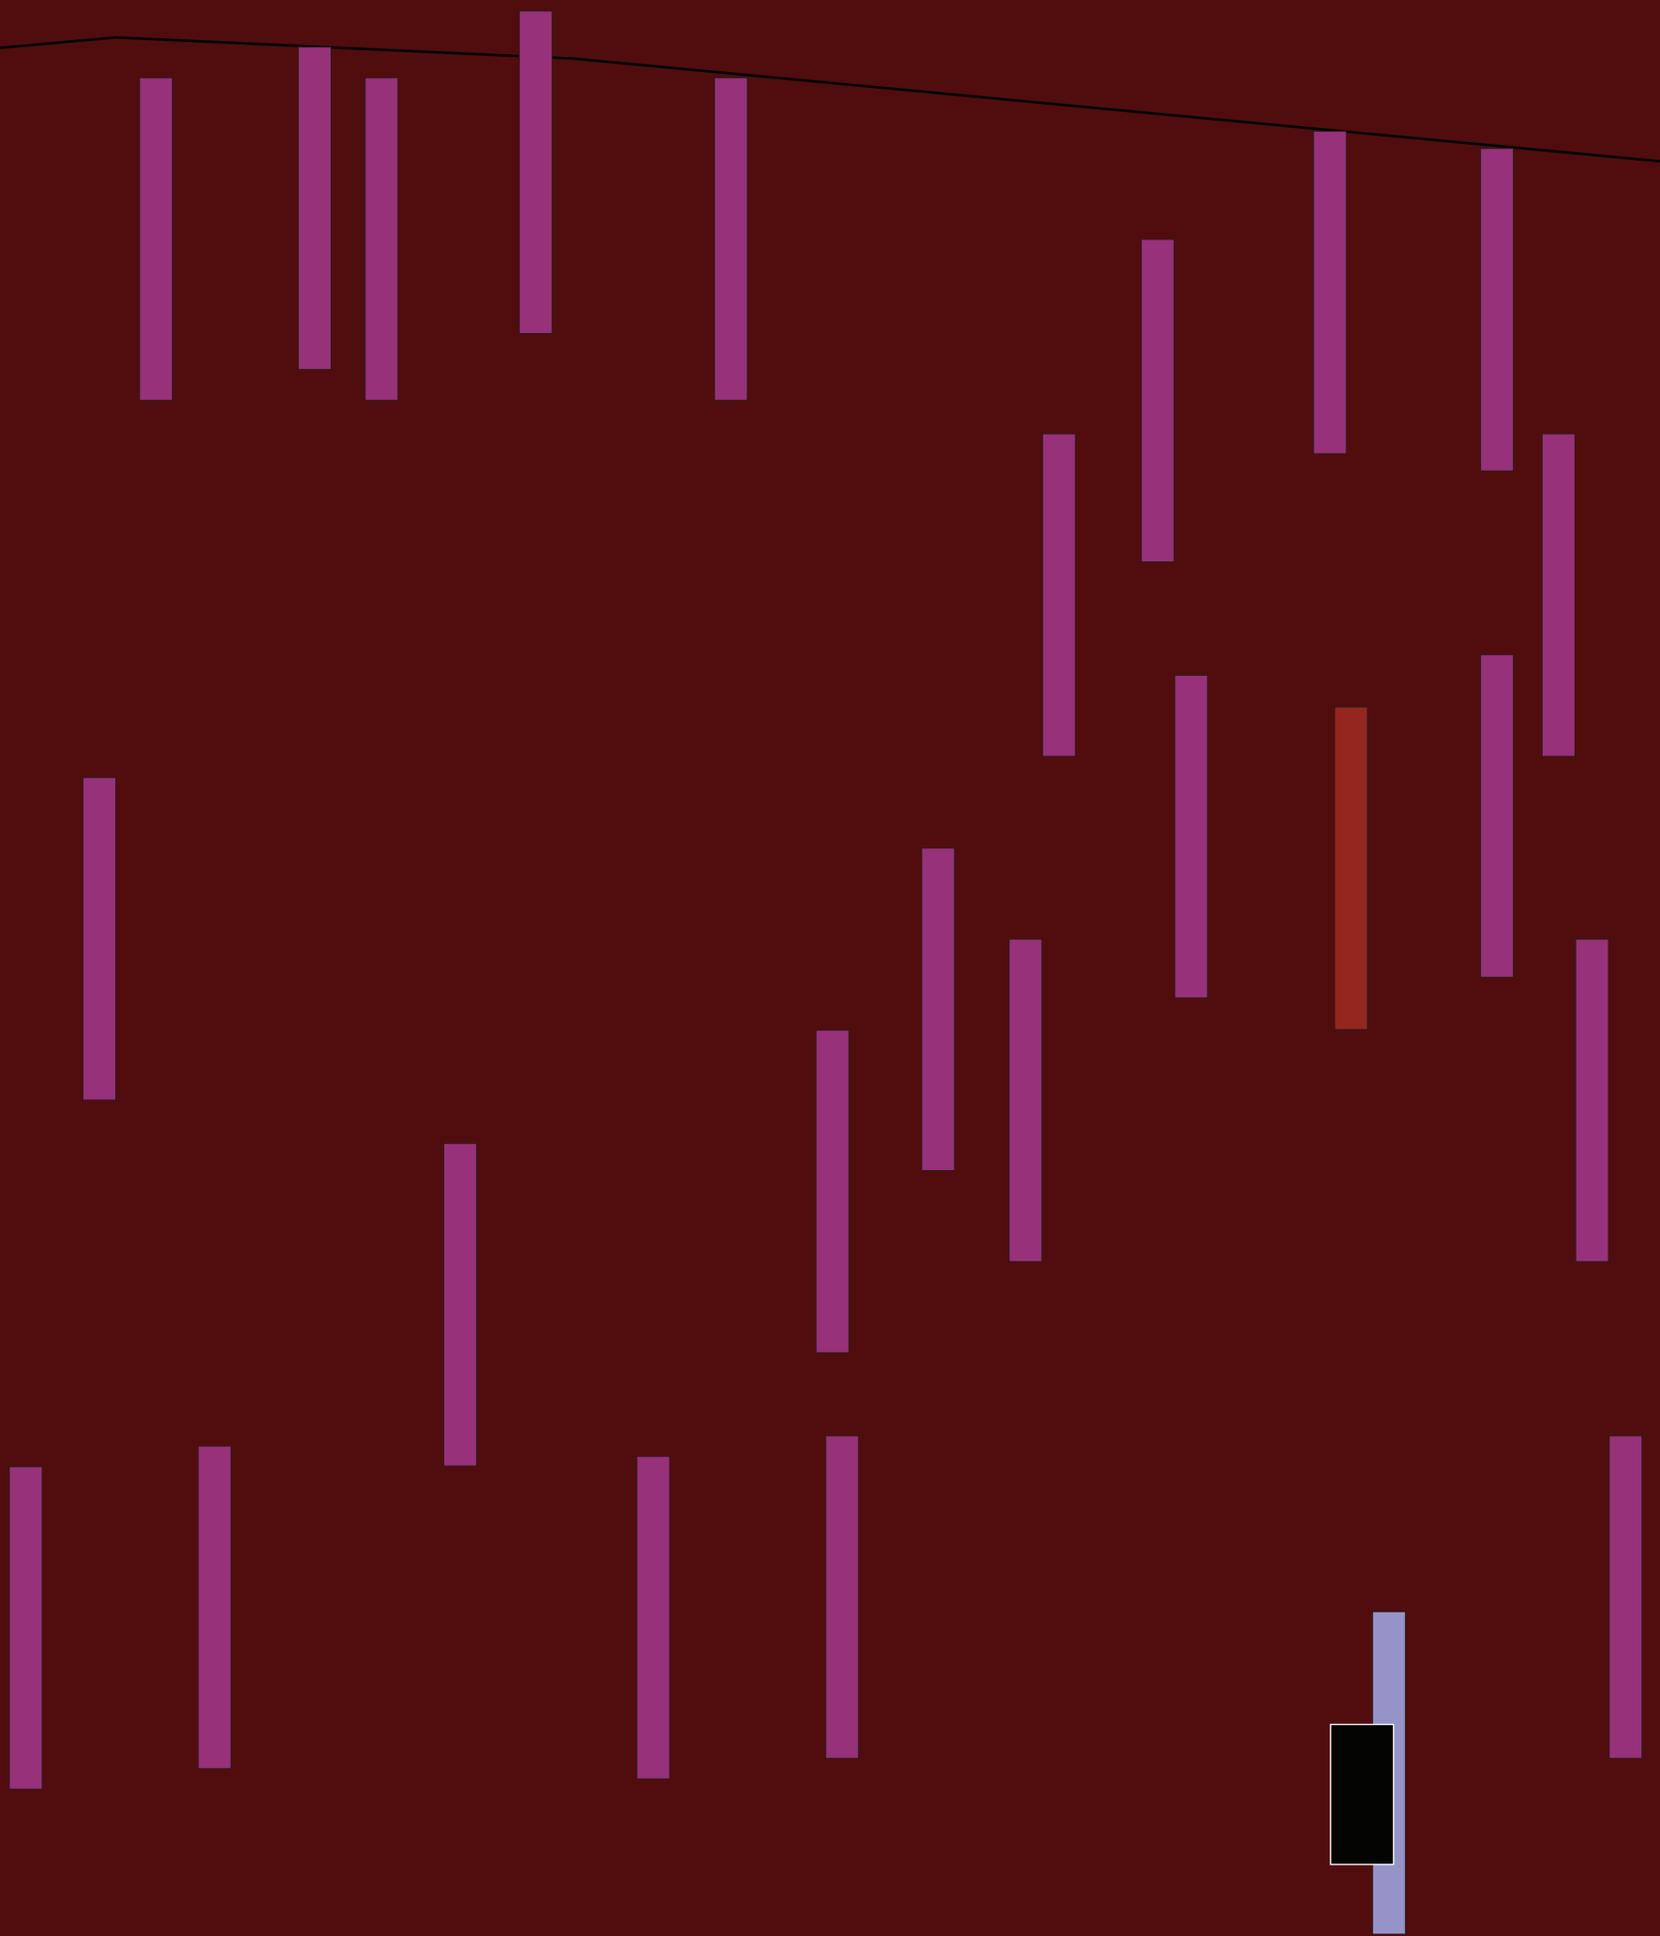

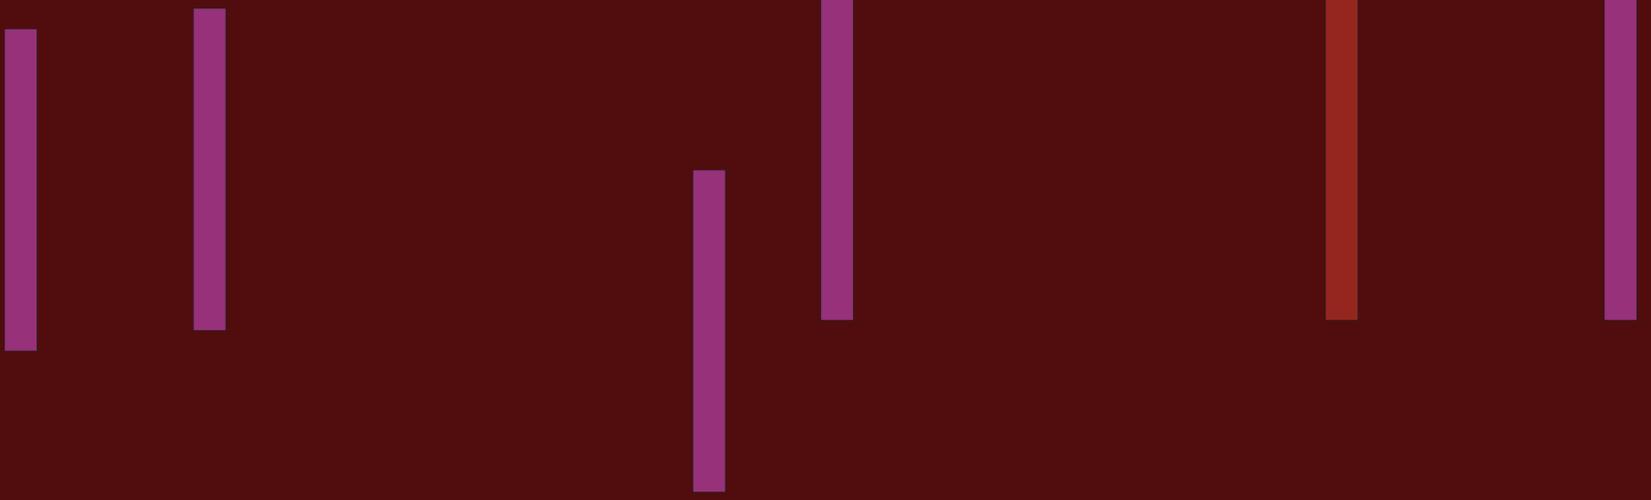

“Wait, where are you going??”

“Wait, don’t go in that direction!!”

I'm pretty sure it was this way!

It's not that far to the condor...

Can't believe he was trying to keep it...

“Girl, be careful,
that’s not the exit!”

*I’m positive this is it.
All that cross country paying off now...*

Then abruptly, a soft landing. For a second, Ellie was too shocked to think. The surface she was on felt smooth. Slippery. Gross.

Were those... scales?

“There she is! She’s okay!
We need to kill the snake!”

“There she is! She’s okay!
We need to stop it before it’s too late!”

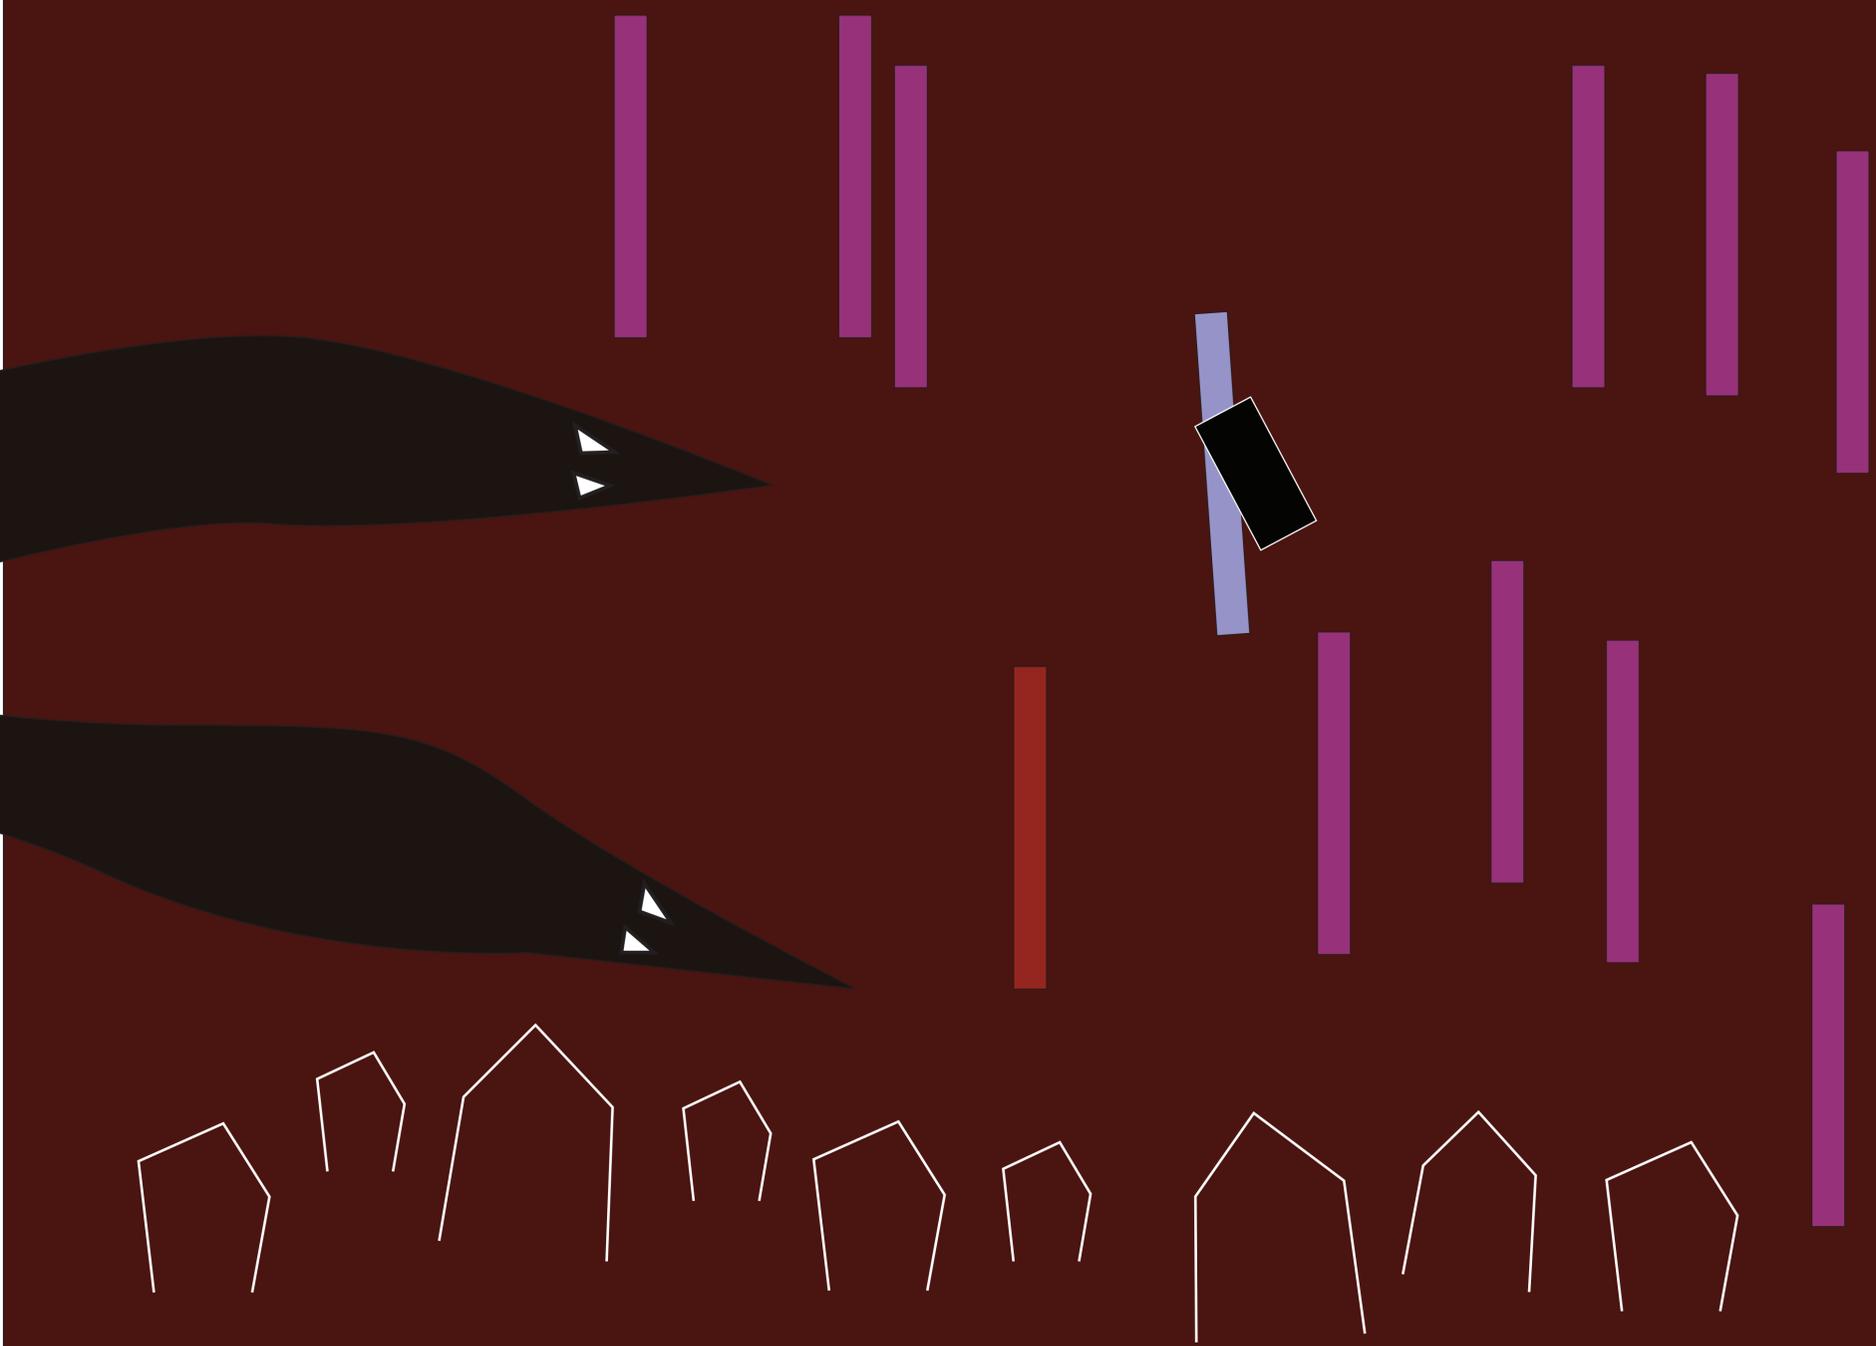

Ellie saw the spirits. They were wielding machetes, spears, assortments of other weapons — and they ran right past Ellie towards the snake!

god of the mountain.”

“What is the meaning of this?
And on solstice day, no less?”

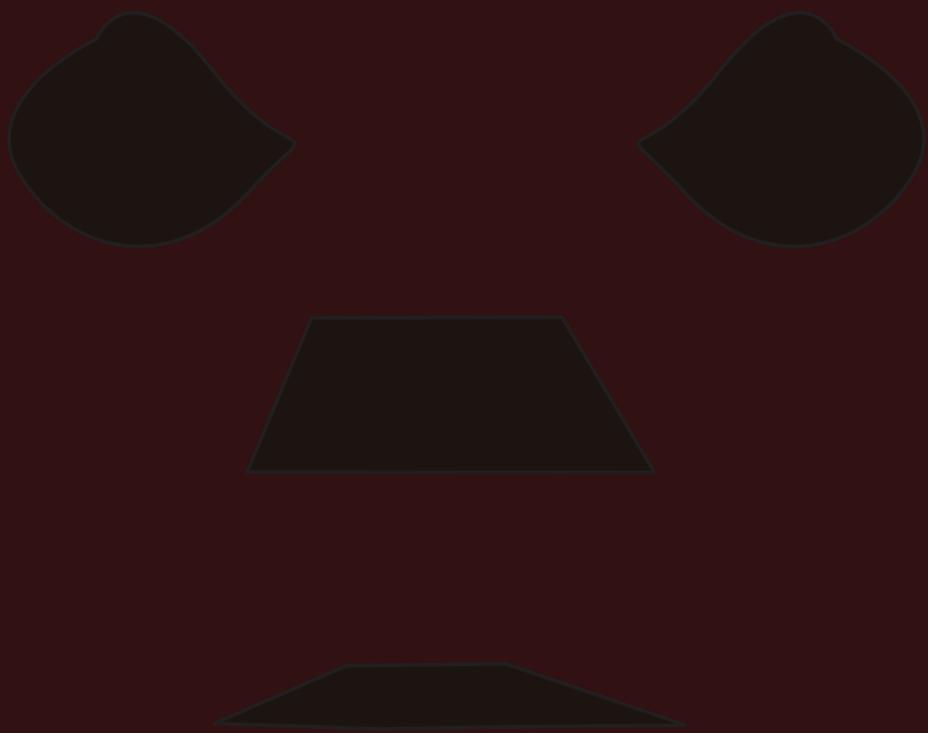

“I wasss hungry...”

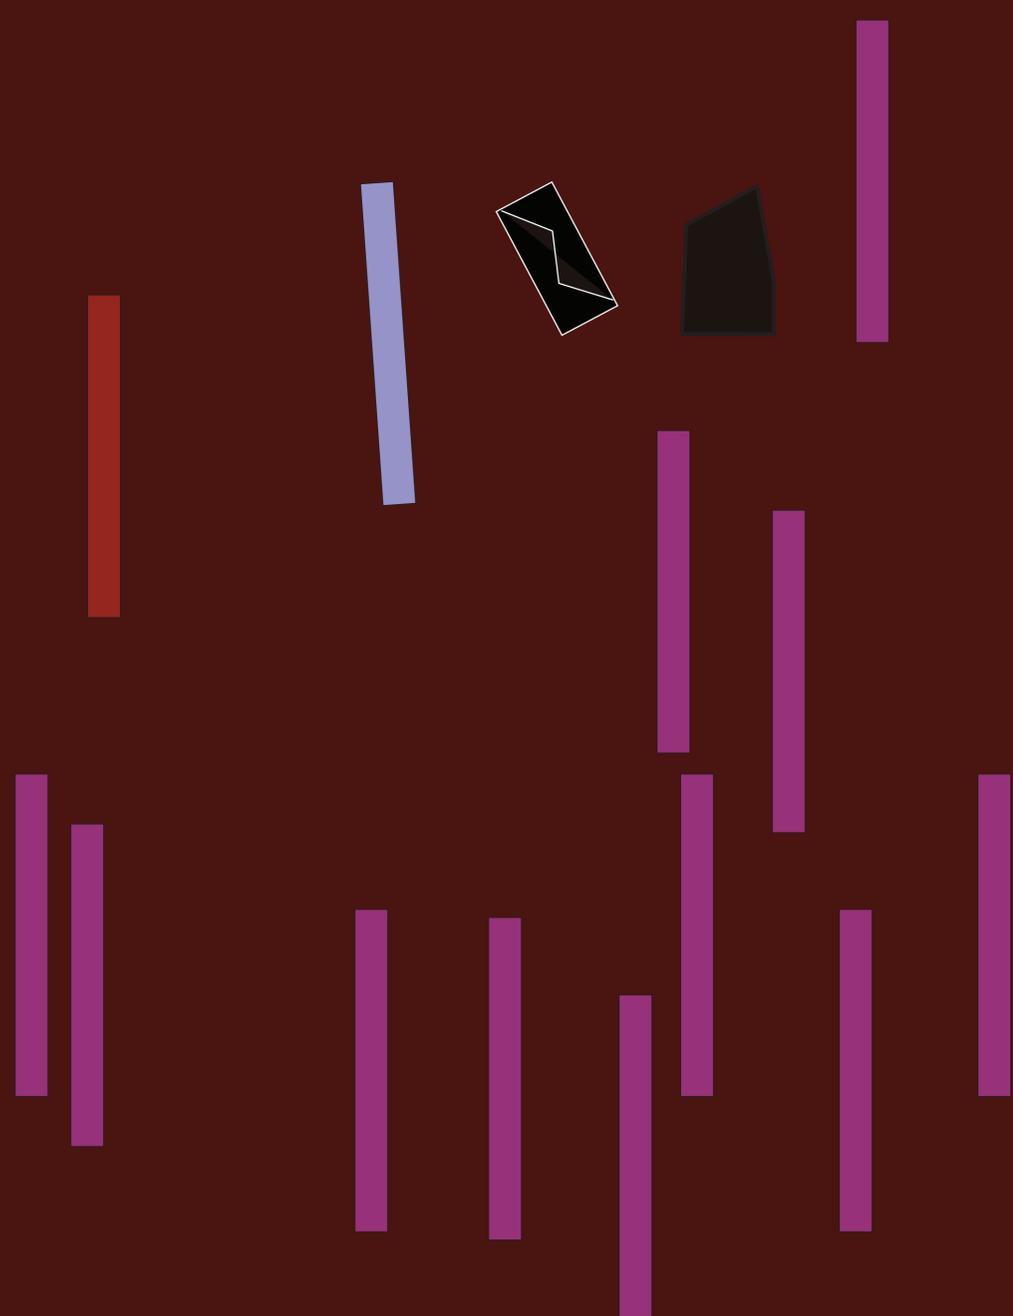

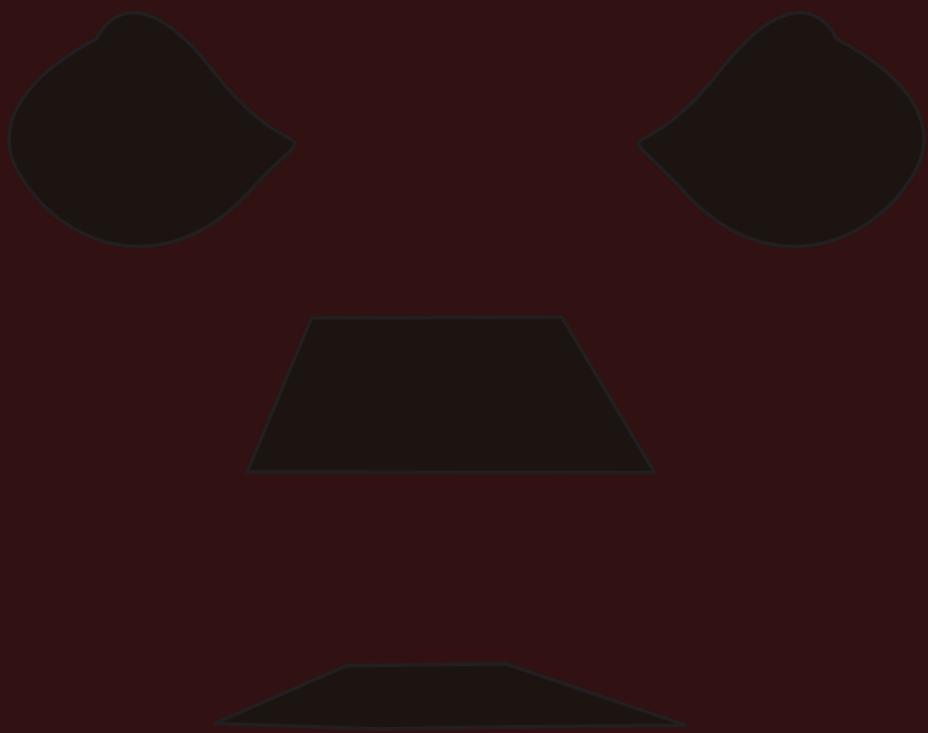

“Well, you see...”

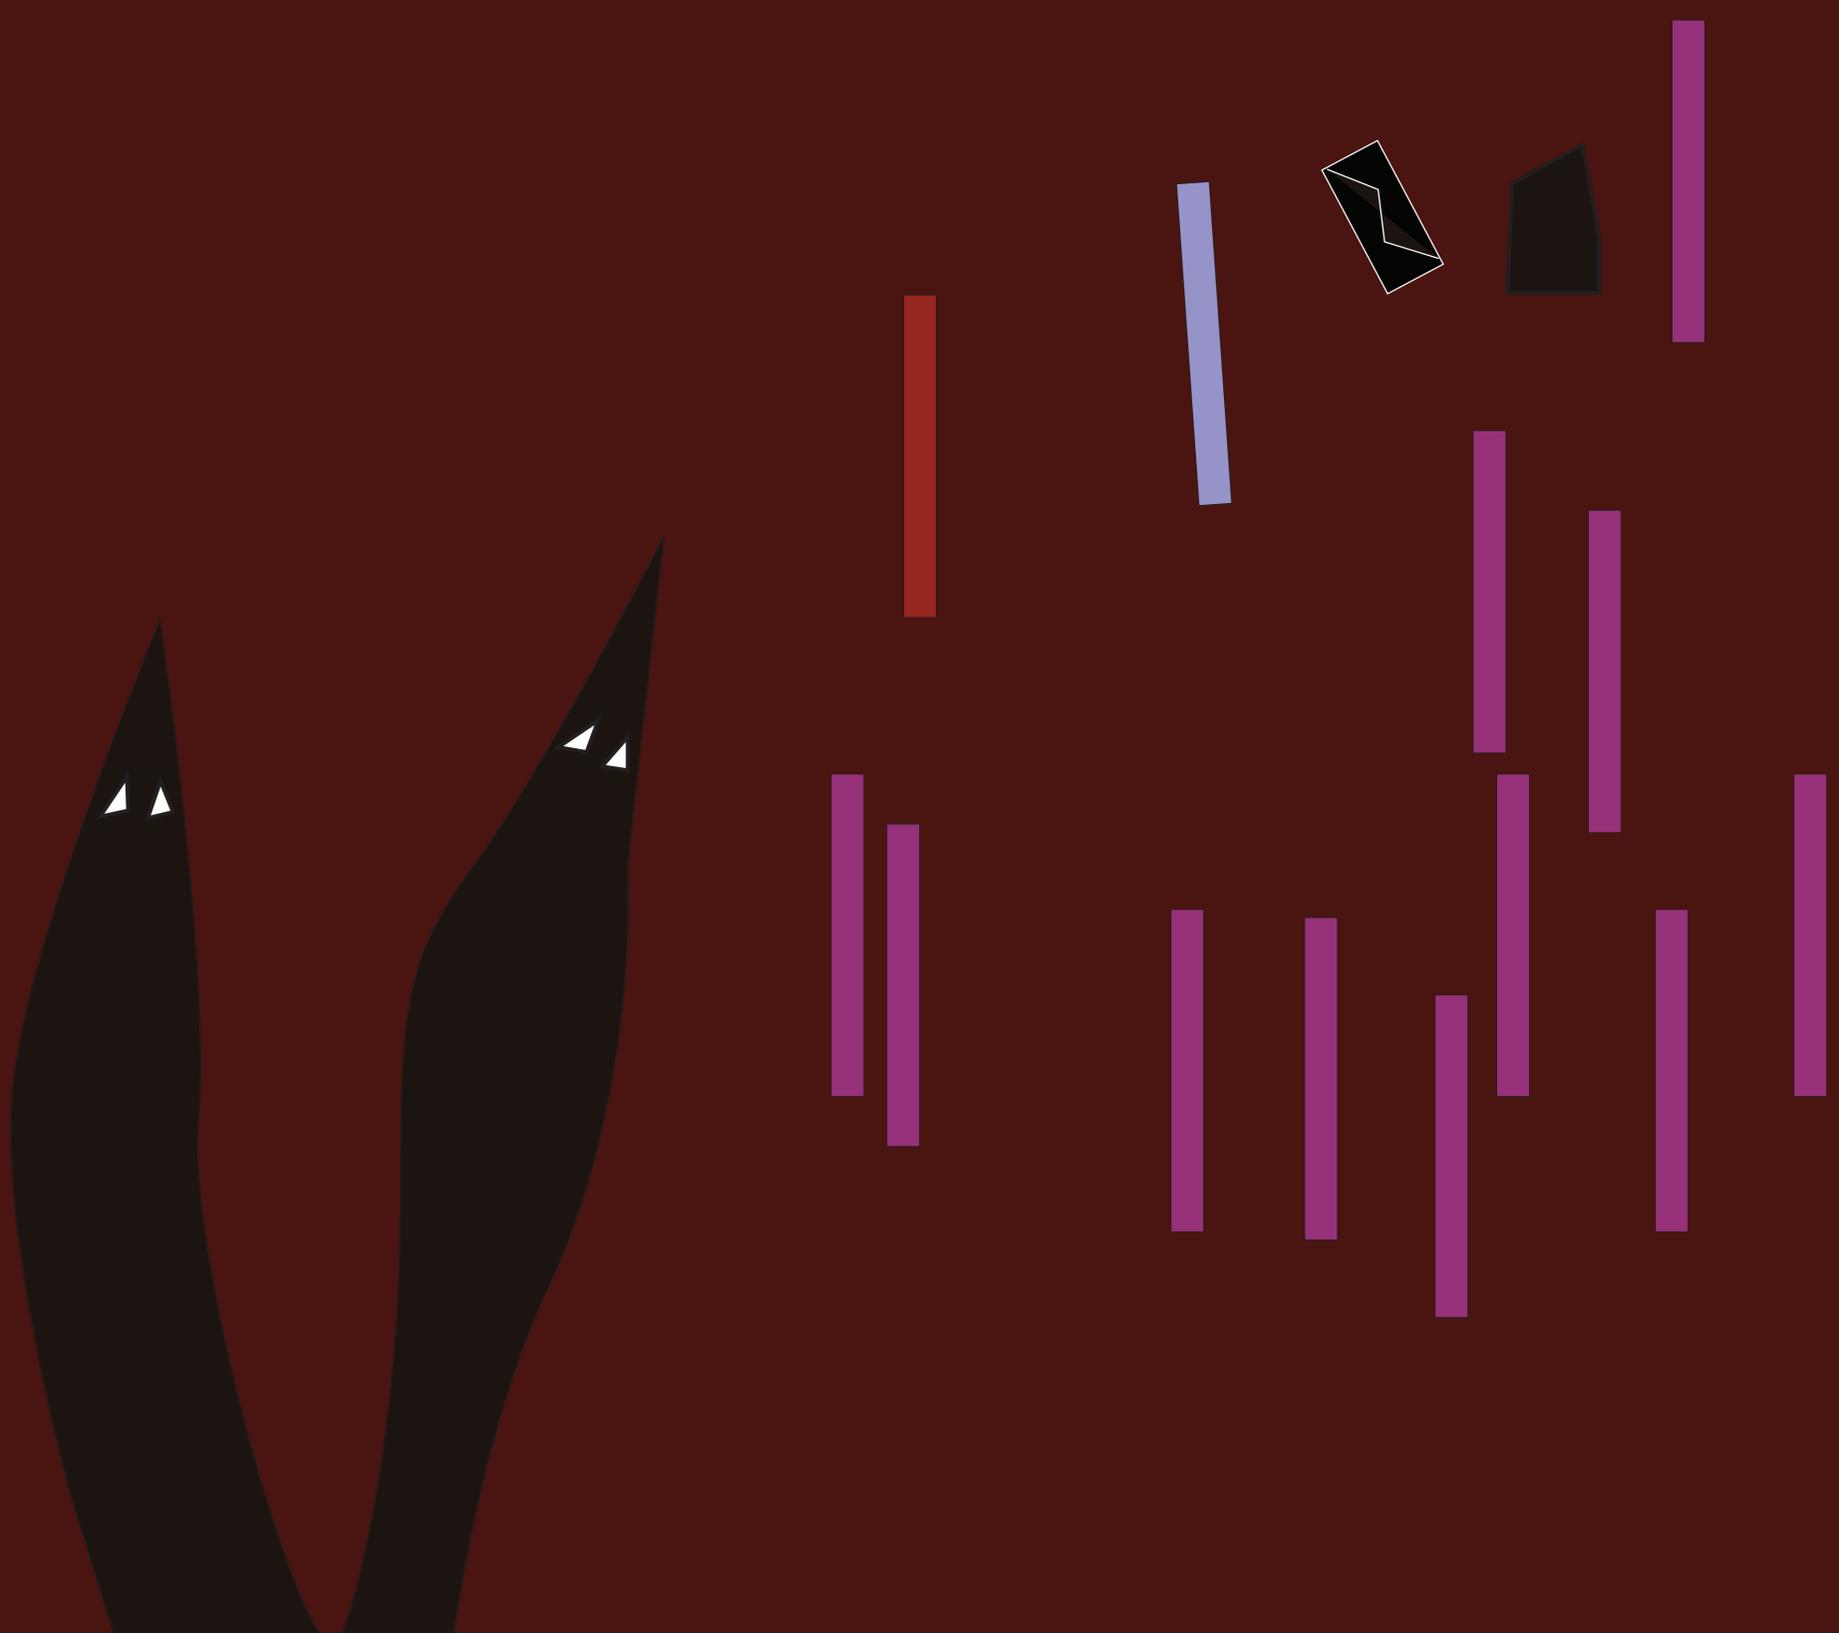

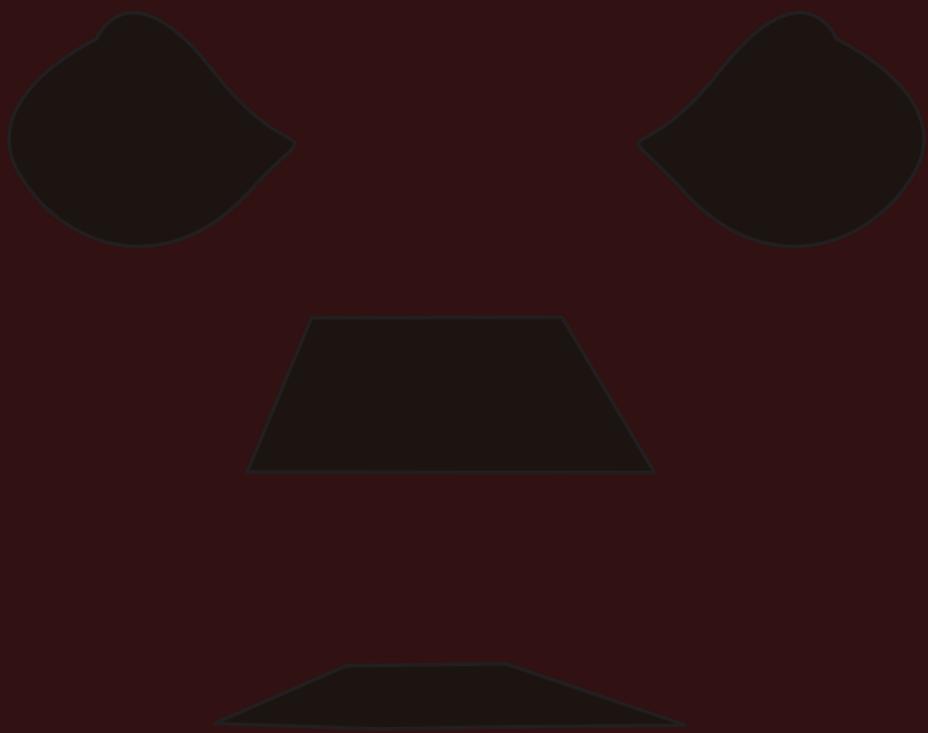

“SILENCE!!!!!!”

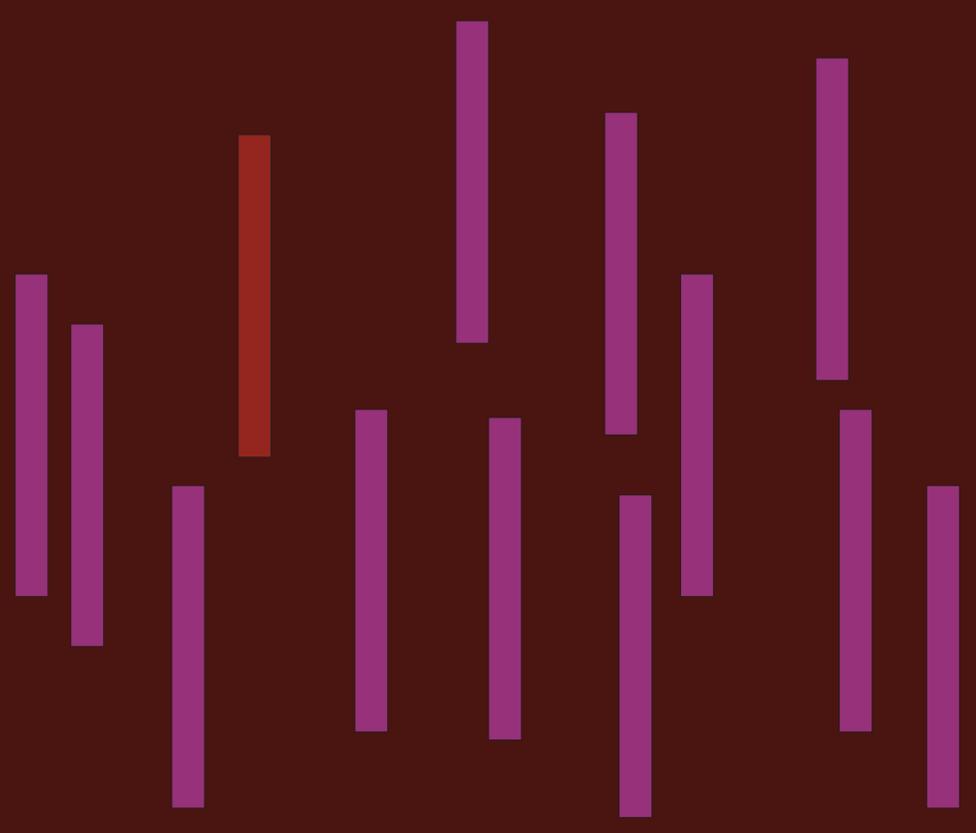

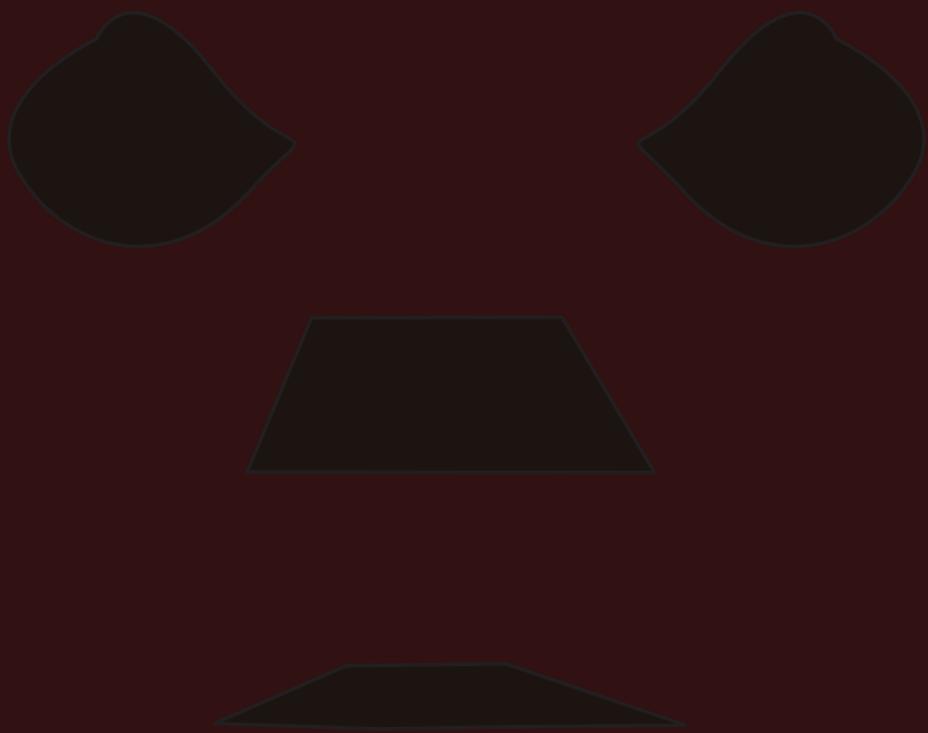

“I want to hear from the child.”

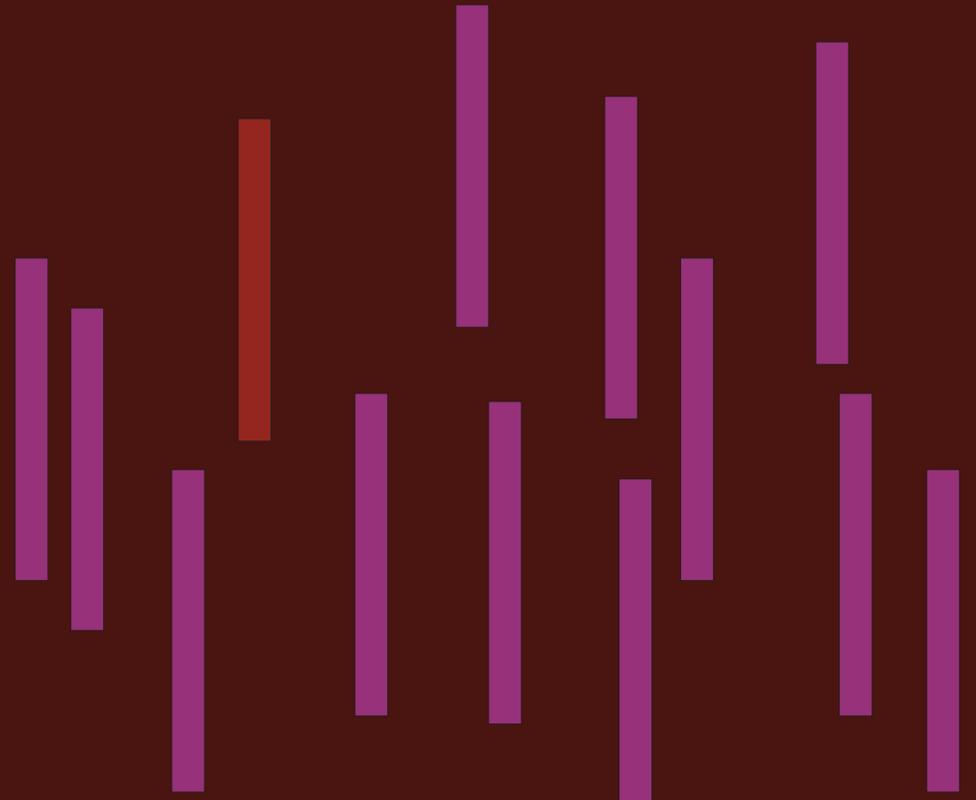

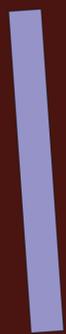

“Well, I lost my cell phone earlier today, and...” Ellie was crying now.

“Come, child.”

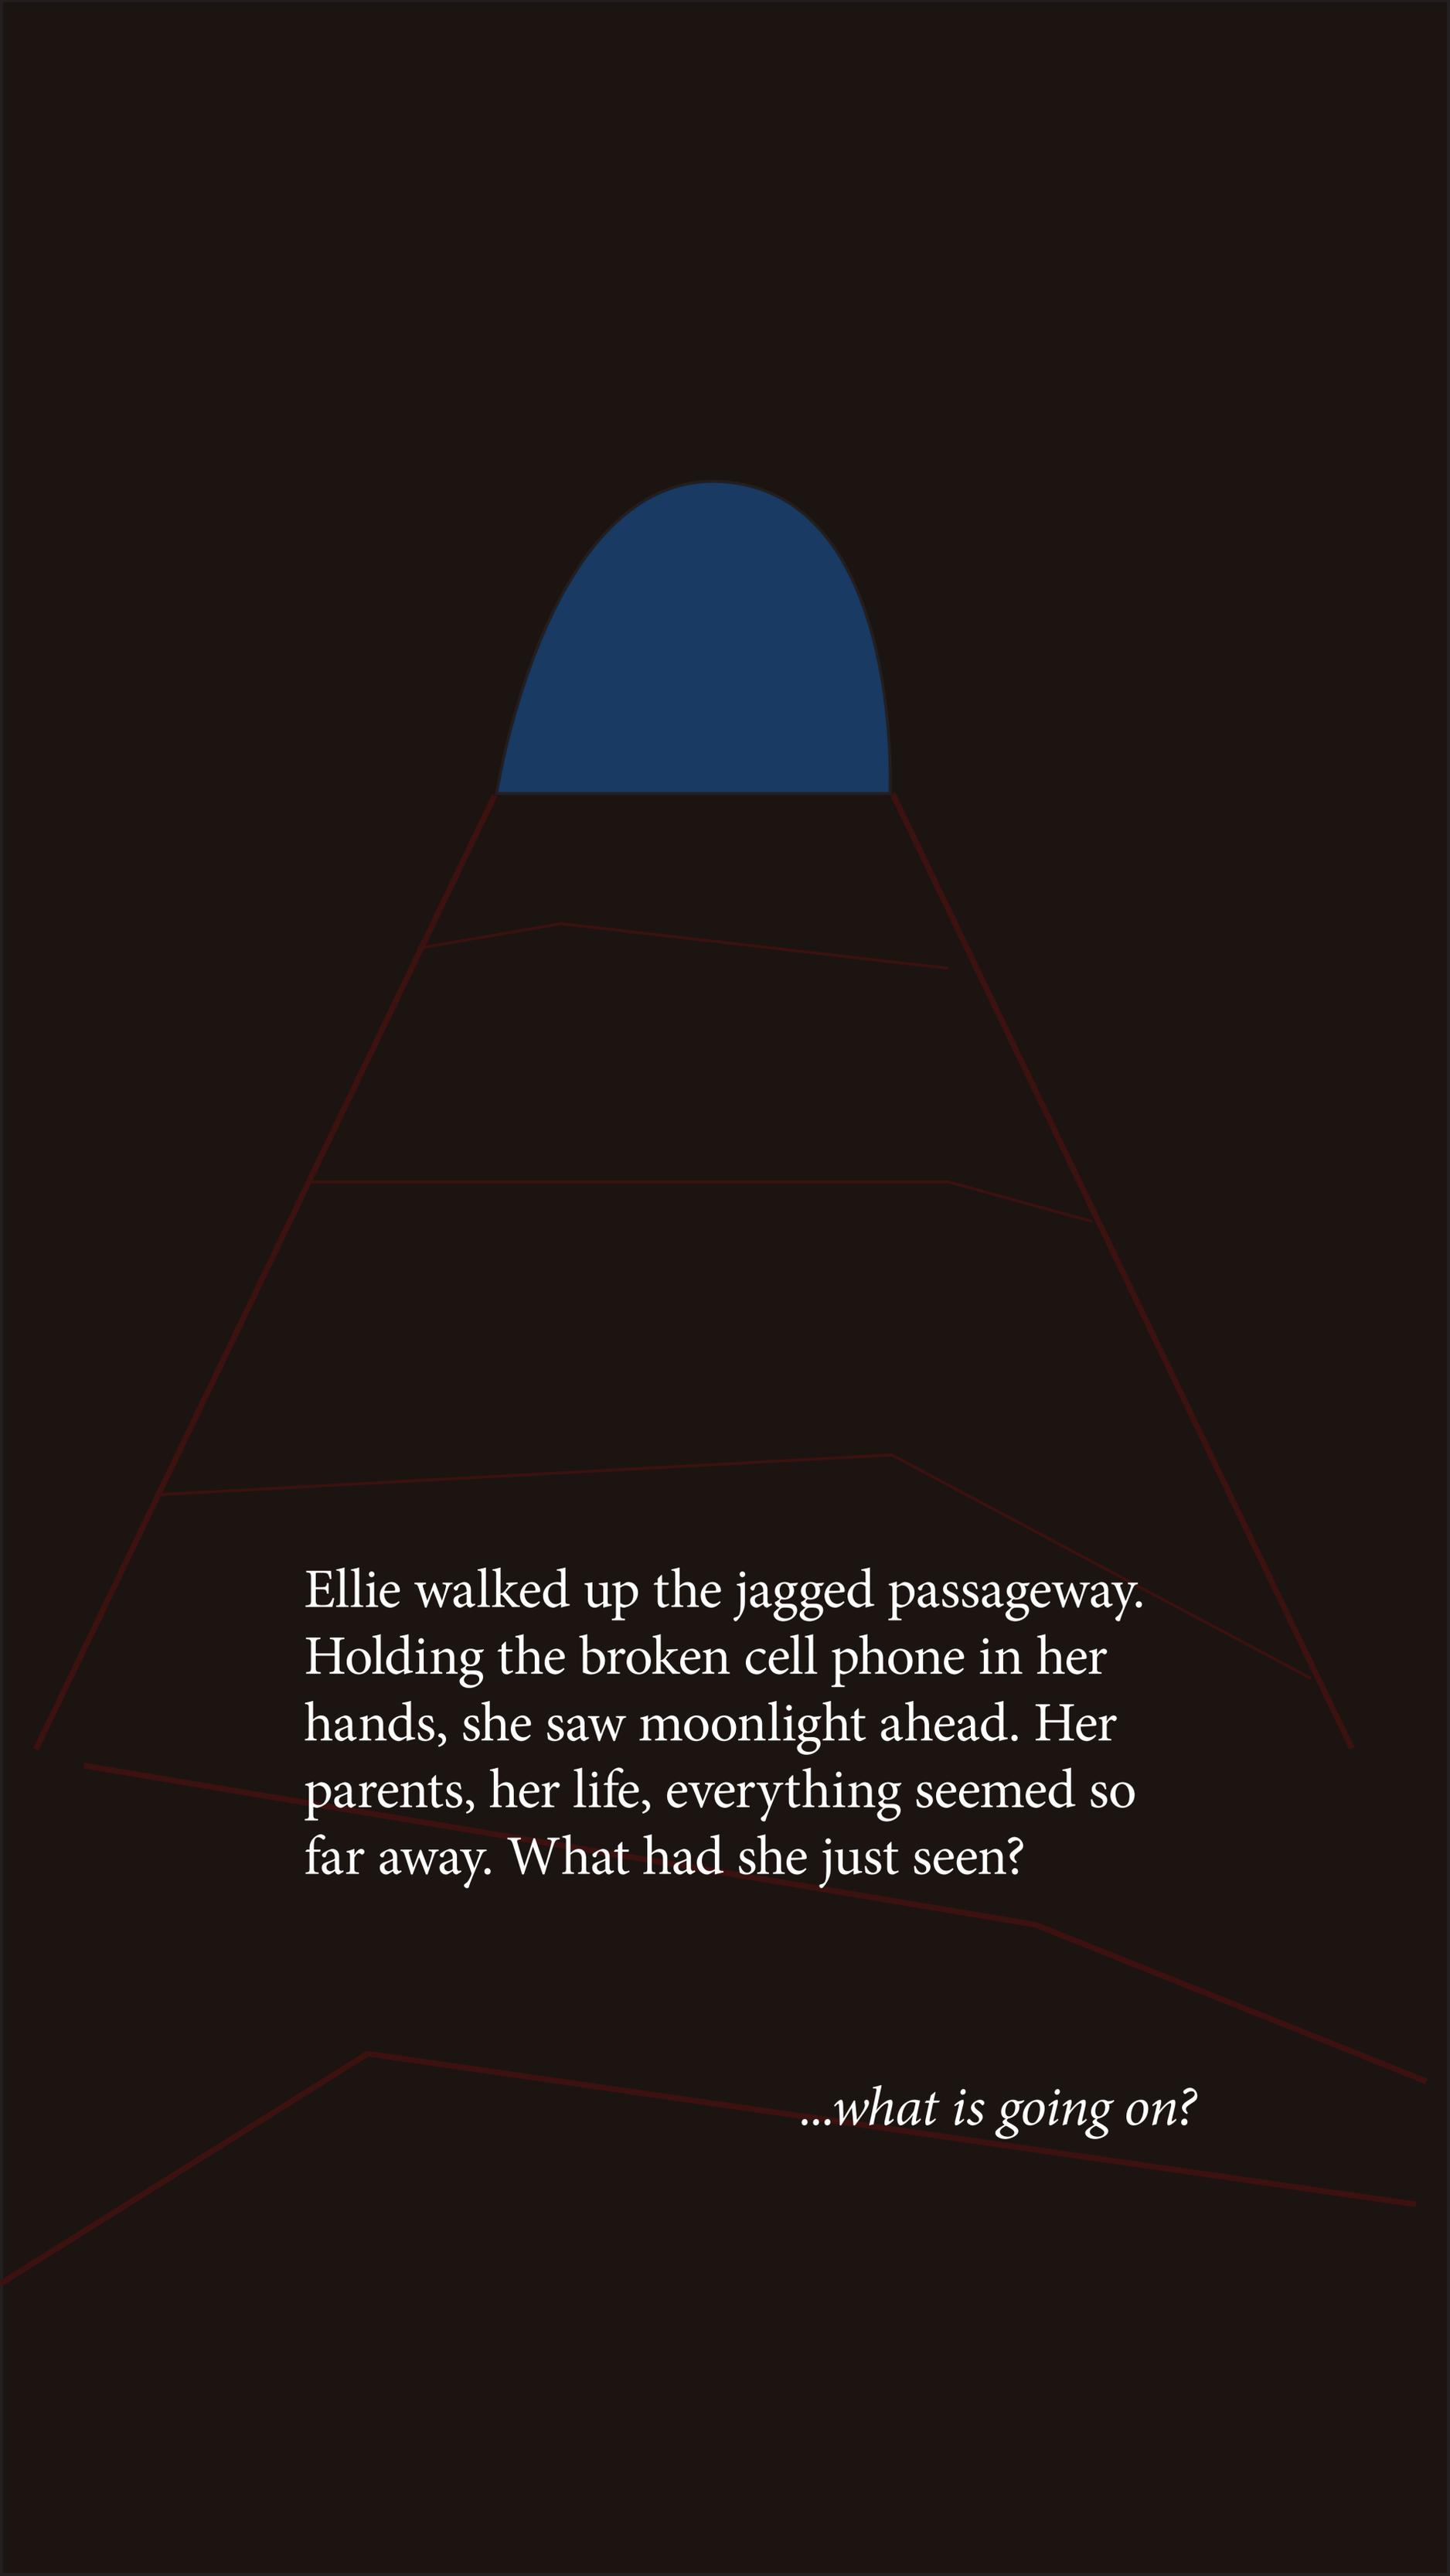

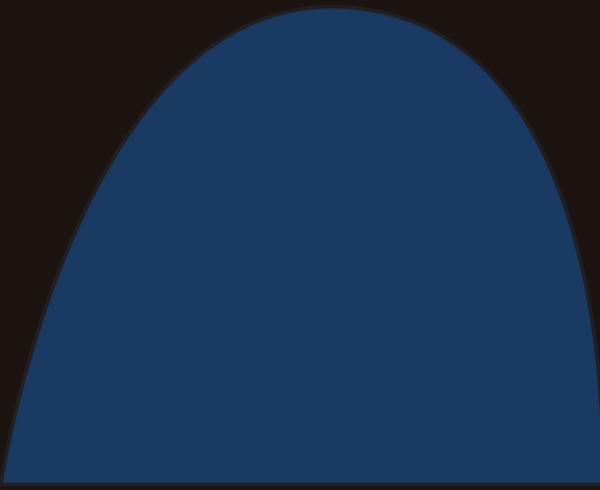

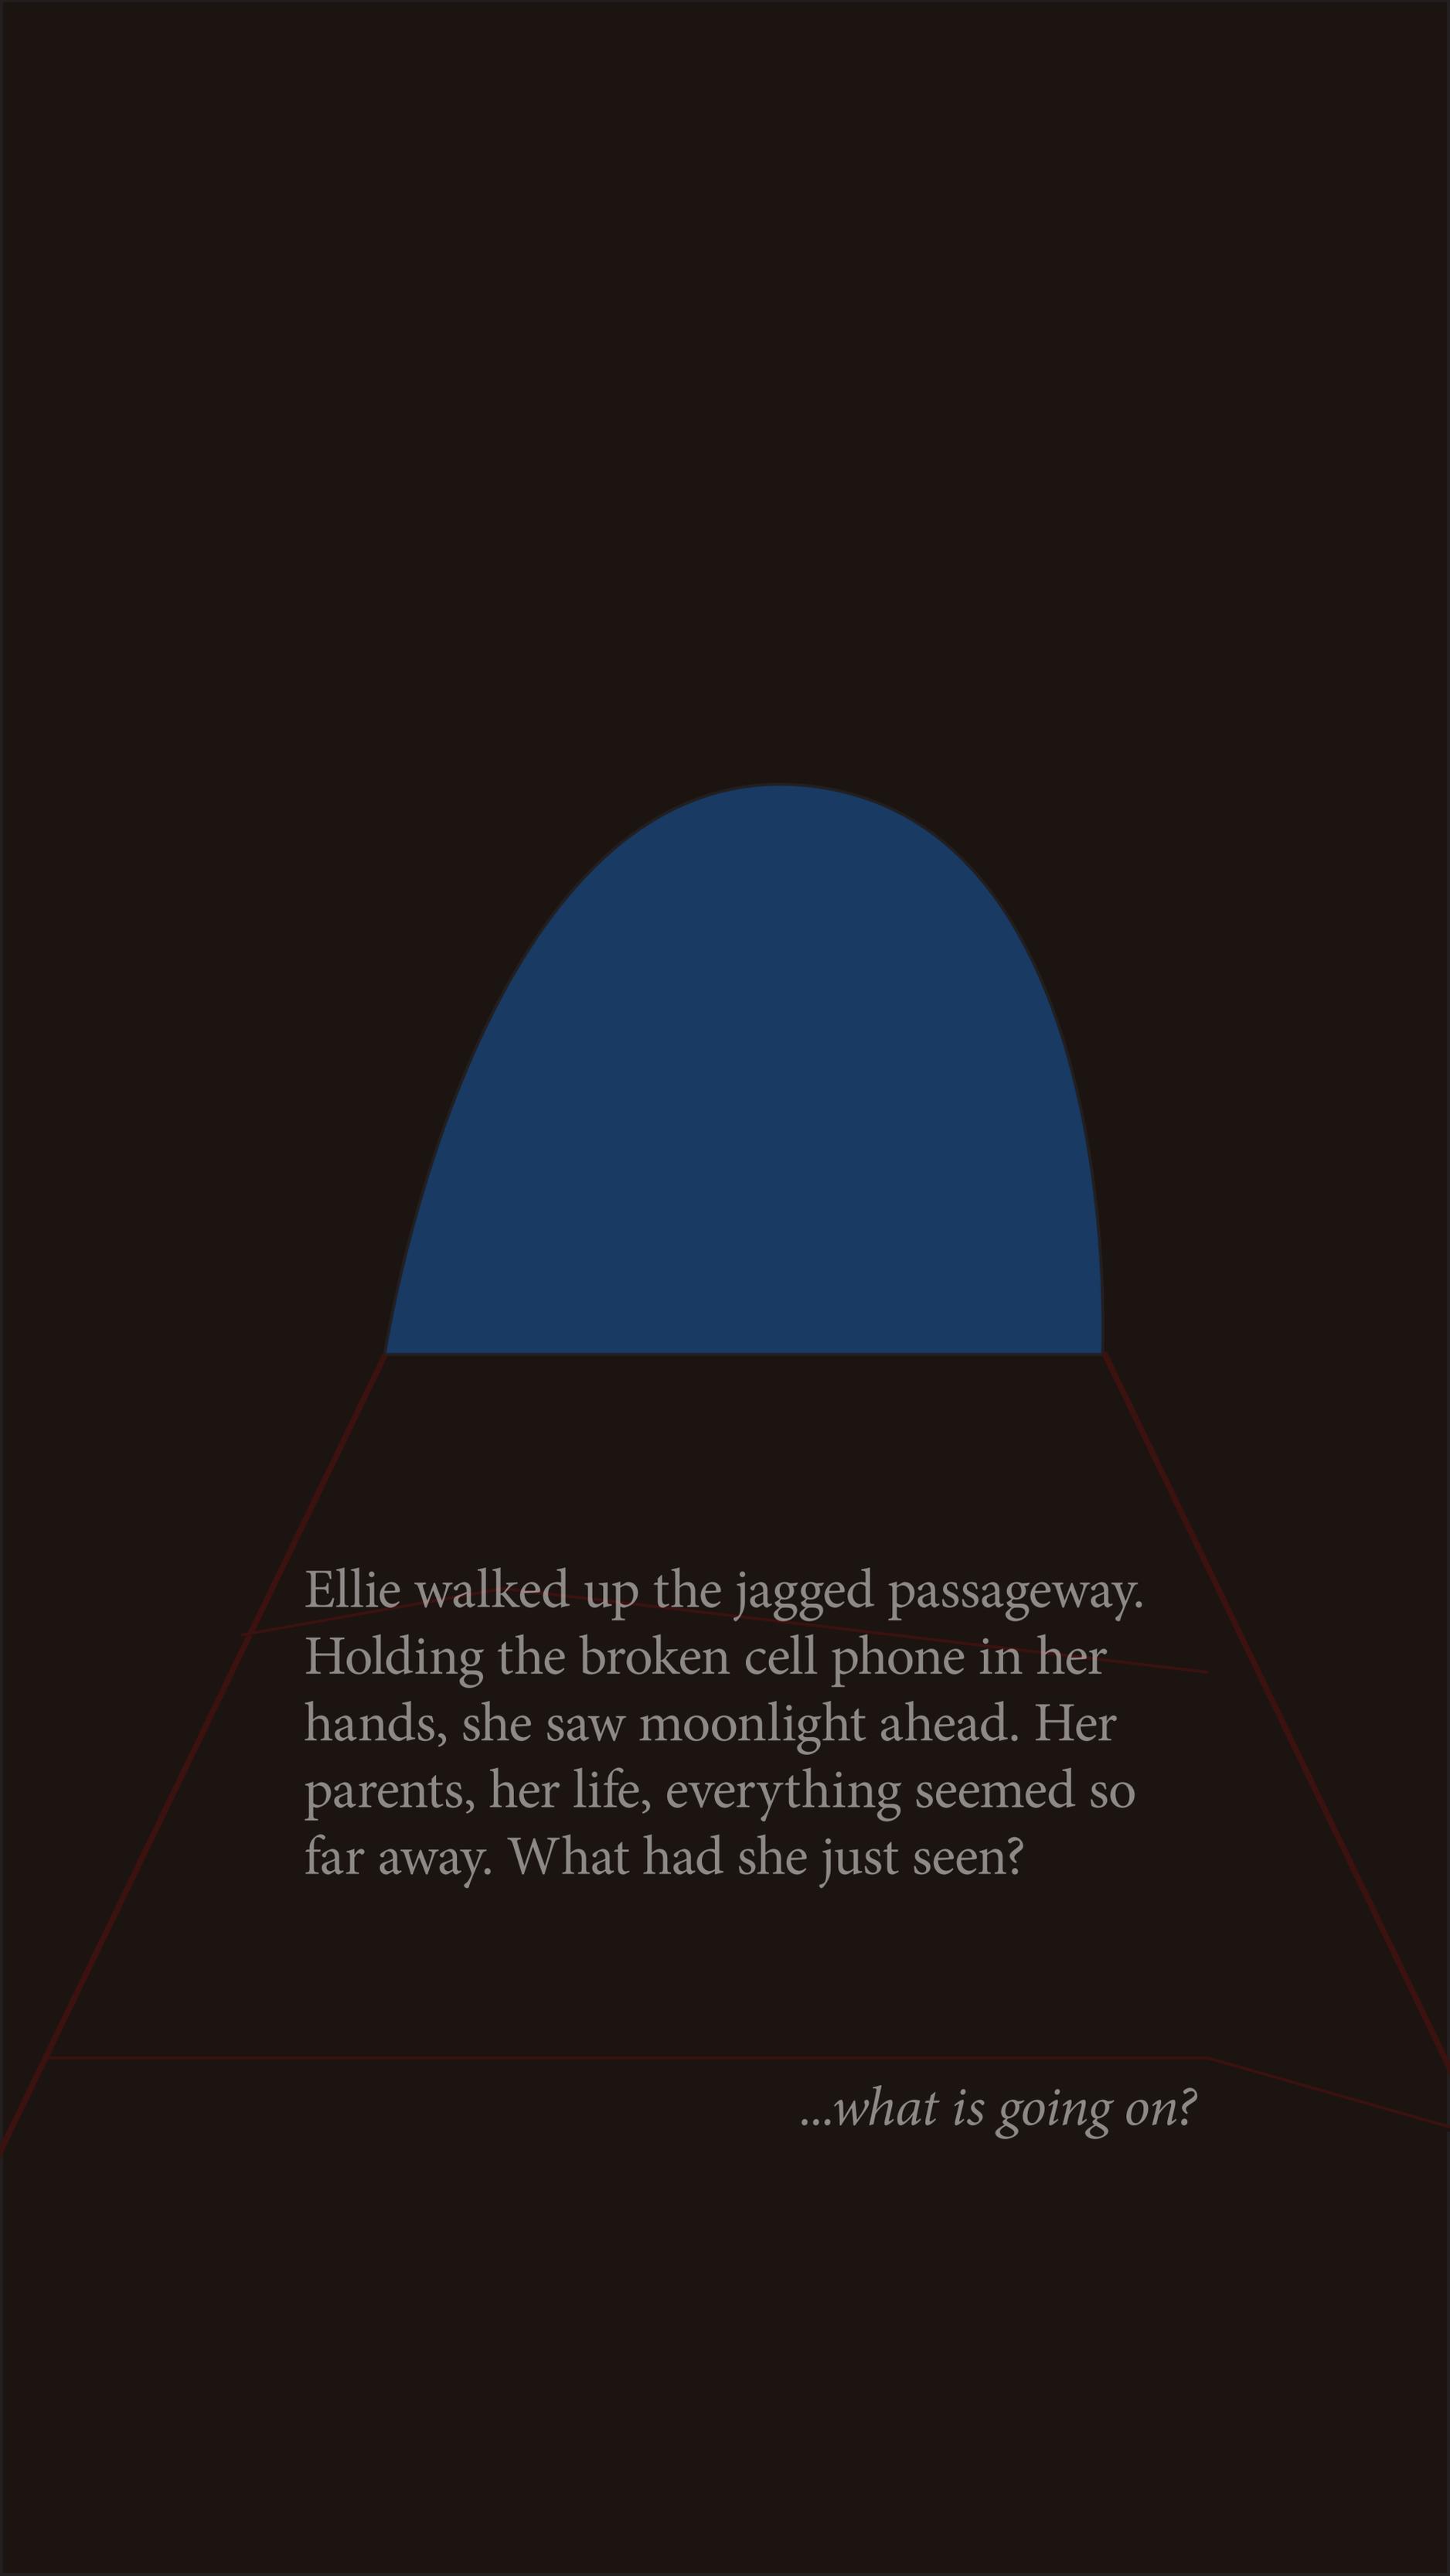

Ellie walked up the jagged passageway.
Holding the broken cell phone in her hands, she saw moonlight ahead. Her parents, her life, everything seemed so far away. What had she just seen?

...what is going on?

There, on a plateau seemingly at the top of the world, the condor was waiting for her.

“So, you’ve made it out at last.”

“How did you know I’d be here?”

“My child, I am the spirit of the mountain.
Of course I knew you’d be here.”

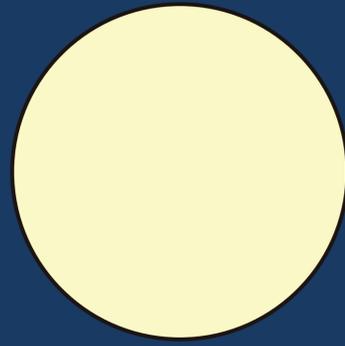

“Wait, so that means the earthquake this morning...?”

“A part of the plan, to be able to show you this...”

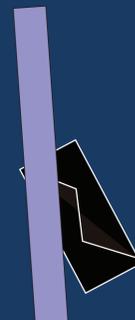

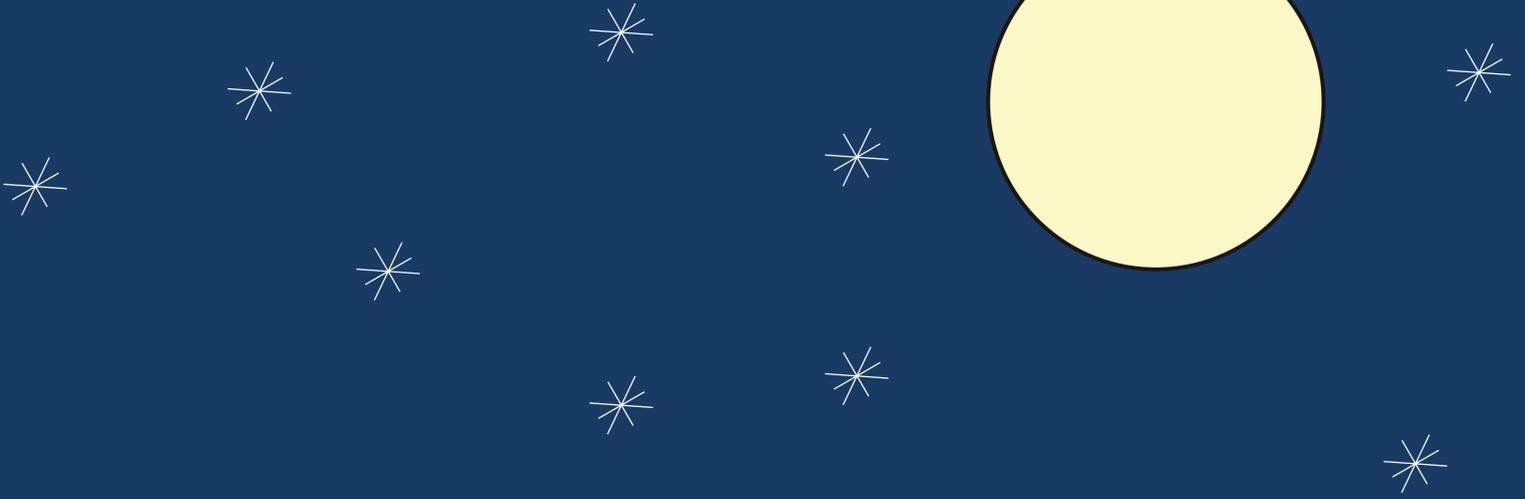

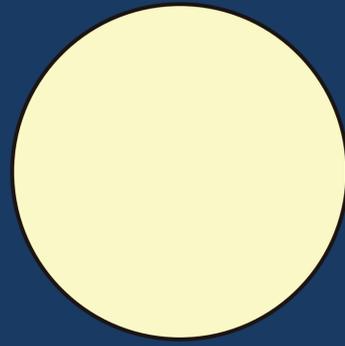

Ellie saw strands of light, first hundreds, then millions of them, rising from all around and into the sky.

“What is all this?”

“You see, every object, every person, everything on earth, even your cell phone, has a spirit. “

“You see, every object, every person, everything on earth, even your cell phone, has a spirit.”

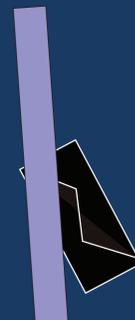

“All of these spirits are connected. And that’s why we celebrate the solstice, and why we have the mountain ceremonies.”

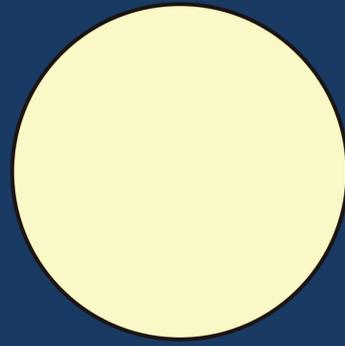

“All of these spirits are connected.
And that’s why we celebrate the solstice, and why we have the mountain ceremonies.”

“To remember and celebrate those connections.”

“To remember and celebrate those connections.”

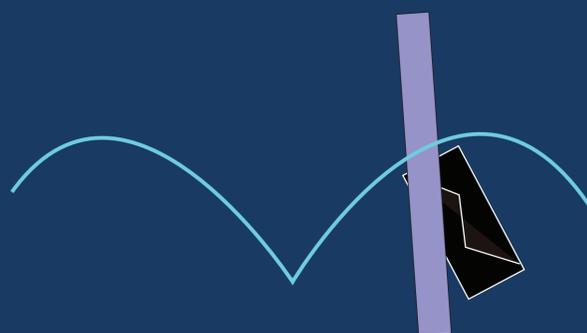

“I didn’t know all of this was here...”

“You shouldn’t ignore it! Just because you can’t always see, that doesn’t mean it’s not there.”

The condor nudged the cell phone, and Ellie saw a strand of light emerge from it...

“The cell phone isn’t bad. Like you, like me, it has its own spirit. But the cell phone, like anything, when used too much, throws you off balance.

“You must learn to also acknowledge,
and appreciate the other forces in you life, for they are part of the great cosmos.”

They flew back to the hotel. At ease, Ellie breathed deeply and noticed for what seemed like the first time how fresh the air was. It was a beautiful night.

“Thank you, sir Condor.”

“My pleasure.”

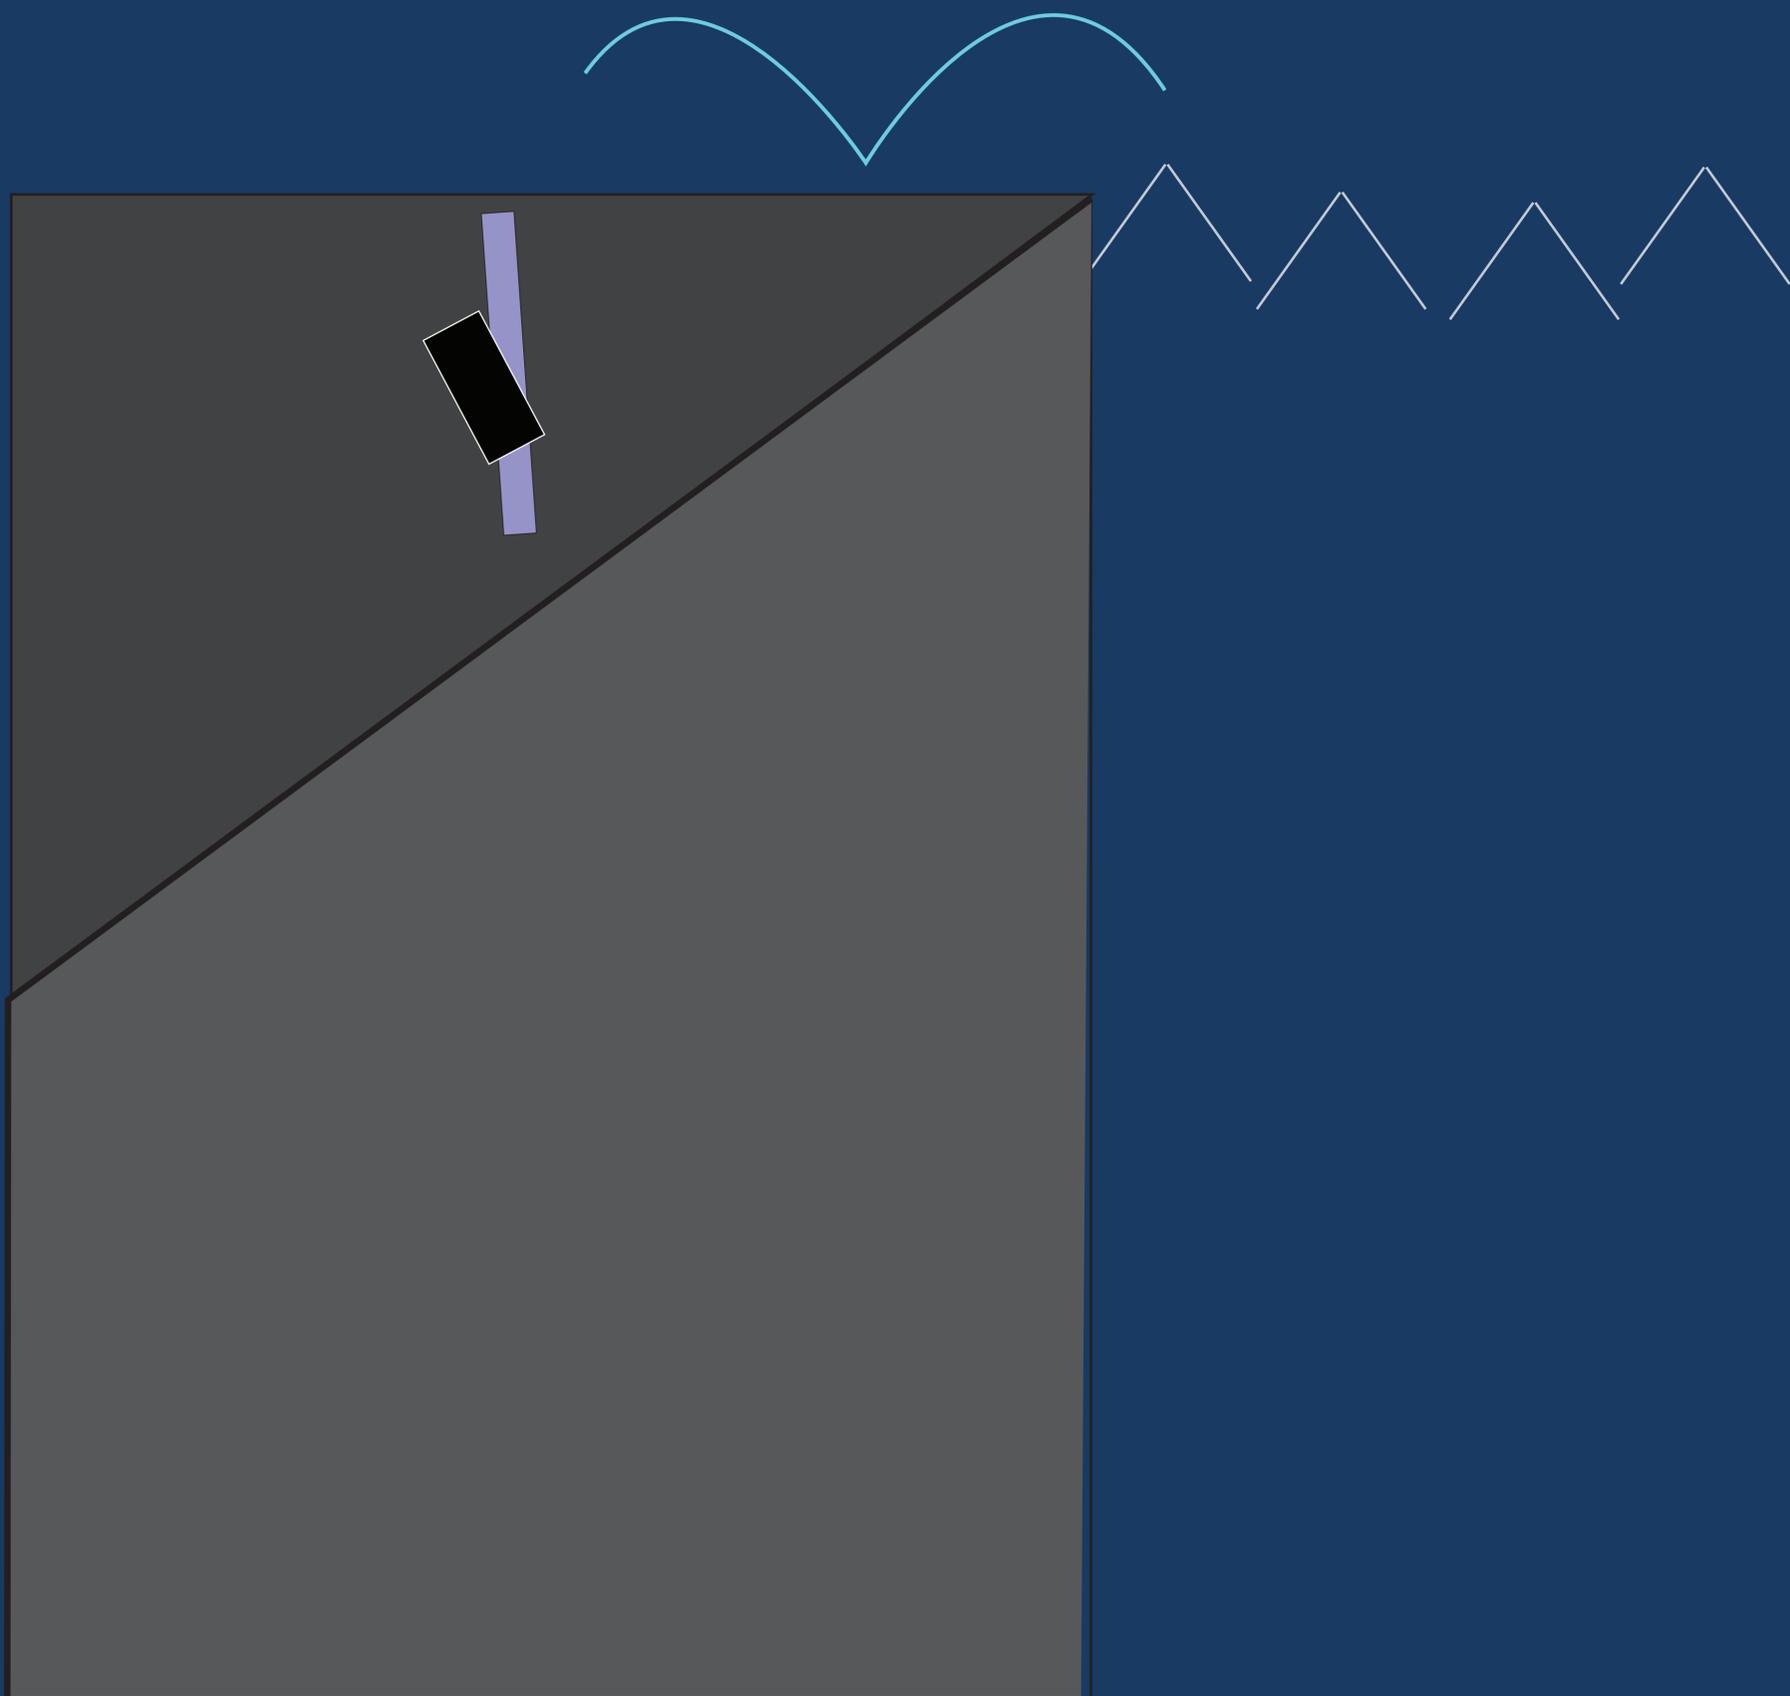

“...will I ever see you again?”

“Whenever you go to a hill, or mountain,
and you see a bird flying near the top...
That is the spirit of the mountain.”

The next day...

“Ellie!”

Mom was calling from the river bank.

“Ellie!”

Mom was calling from the river bank. “Do you want to go rafting?”

soo exhausted...

“Sure!” Ellie said, trying to sound upbeat. She hadn’t told them about her adventure last night yet. Would she...? How could she even explain?”

“Sorry to say,” Dad said, “but they say the river’s too rough for rafting today. Looks like we won’t be able to do it.”

“Sorry to say,” Dad said, “but they say the river’s too rough for rafting today. Looks like we won’t be able to do it.”

“Actually, I have an idea...” Ellie said.

Ellie walked up to the side of the river. She looked up and down its rough waters. Then she said, “River, I think — I know — that you have a spirit. And you don’t have to, but I’m wondering if... just for today... you could let me and my parents ride on you?”

“Ellie, what are you doing?” Mom asked.

“It’s umm, something I learned from the mountain ceremony,” Ellie said. “Maybe we just need to ask the river permission before we can go on it.”

“Ellie, what are you doing?” Mom asked.

“Well how about we grab some lunch?” Dad said. “Maybe things will clear up. We can try again later.”

And Ellie couldn't help but admire the landscape as they paddled downstream.

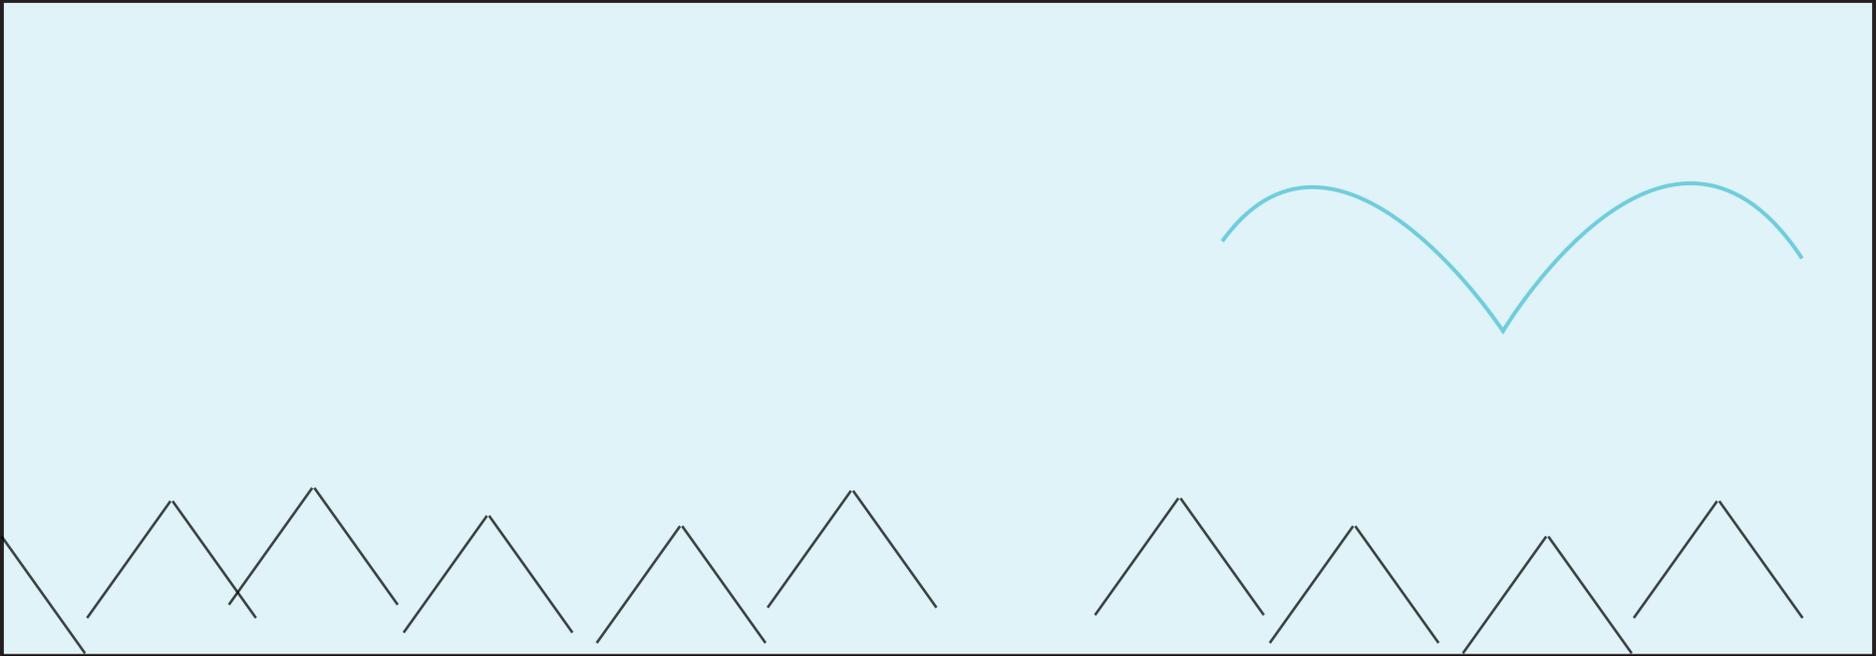

“Ellie, see, looks like this time without your cell phone is doing you good,” Dad said.

“Yeah,” Ellie said, looking up towards the mountains. “It definitely is.”
